side the Good Shepherd between two sheep, and on the other side in three lines DEVS | DEDIT | PAPA. Leaden bulls of the following popes also are still preserved: Honorius (A.D. 638), Theodore I. (A.D. 649), Agatho (A.D. 678), John V. (A.D. 685), Sergius I. (A.D. 687), Constantine (A.D. 708), Zacharias (A.D. 741), Paul I. (A.D. 757), Stephen III. (A.D. 768), as well as of many later pontiffs. On all these, however, the types are very simple, such as a cross, a chrisma, or a star. On one side the name of the pope occurs in the genitive (sometimes in more than one line), on the other the word PAPA (commonly in two lines). Thus: one of John, supposed to be John V., has on obv. a star of eight rays, in the centre, reading IOHANNIS around; the rev. has P + A | PAE in two lines (British Museum). Another of Sergius I. reads on obv. + SERGI on a circle, having for type chrisma and another monogram united with it; rev. PAPA above a chrisma of the ordinary form (Brit. Mus. Figured in English Cyclop. Div. iv., Arts and Sciences, suppl. 1873, s. v. BULLA). Another of Zacharias has on obv. a cross, below which ZAC | CHAR | IAE in three lines; on rev. a cross, below which PA | PAE in two lines (Brit. Mus. Figured also in Martigny, Dict. s. v. Numism. ed. 2). A fourth of Paul I. has on obv. a cross, below which PAV | LI in two lines and beneath another cross. Rev. a cross; PA | PAE in two lines, and another cross below. (Brit. Mus.) Other examples are figured by Ficoroni, u. s. t. xxi.–xxv., and by Martigny, u. s., and are mentioned by Mabillon (de Re Dipl. lib. ii. c. 14). Several may also be seen in the British Museum; their dimensions vary from 1 to 1½ inches across; the form is subcircular.

The leaden bullae of popes, so common in later times, bearing the heads of SS. Peter and Paul are not earlier than the time of Paschal II. A.D. 1099 (Martigny, u. s.). Mabillon (u. s. lib. ii. v. 14) mentions bulls bearing the names of those apostles as issued in the time of Urban II., his immediate predecessor.

The patriarchs of Constantinople were little, if at all, behind the popes in employing leaden bullae. Germanus I. who sat there A.D. 715 to 730, indited an epistle decorated with a bull of lead (μοιυδδινρ βοῦλλα) which is described in the Jus Graeco-Rom. (tom. i. lib. iii. p. 236) as having on one side the Virgin and Child, and on the other (in Greek) "Germanus, by the mercy of God, Archbishop of Constantinople, New Rome, and ecumenical patriarch."

Somewhat later we find other bishops making use of leaden bulls both in the east and in the west.ⁱ The second council of Cabillon, i. e. Châlons-sur-Saône (A.D. 813), c. 41, directs that a presbyter moving to another place should carry letters fortified by the names of the bishop and the city in lead (in quibus sint nomina episcopi et civitatis plumbo munita). See Mabillon, u. s. lib. ii. c. xv. Other later authorities make ⁱ The Lex Alamannorum has a chapter: De servis ecclesiasticis, si ad Episcopum aut Iudicem suum venire deseperint, in which occurs this clause: "Si sigillum episcopi neglexerit aut ad veniendum aut ad ambulandum ubi jusserit, duodecim solidis sit culpabilis" (ap. Goldast. Rer. Aleman. tom. i. c. 22, p. 13). These may be suspected to be of lead, like those mentioned in council of Châlons.

mention of similar episcopal bulls (Heinecc. u. s. p. 49). The practice appears, however, to have been far from universal, and no actual examples earlier than the 12th century were known to Heineccius (u. s. p. 151). The writer, however, possesses a bulla of Hypatius, bishop of Nicopolis, in Epirus, in A.D. 626, of whom some account is given in Le Quien, Oriens Christ. vol. ii. p. 138. It reads in barbarous Greek on the obverse: + ΙΠΠΑ || CIOV: on the reverse + below which ΕΠΙΚ || ΝΙΚΟΥ below which vertically, ΟΠ (retrograde) and another cross (for ἐπισκ(όπου) Νικουπό(λεως). (Formerly in the Lovati collection at Rome.) Other episcopal bulls exist about whose age it is less easy to speak, as that of Nicolaus, patriarch of Constantinople, of whom there were several so named from the 9th to the 12th century (Ficoroni, tab. xvii. n. 1, Böckh, n. 9036), of Leo, bishop of Tauro-menium (Ficoroni, tab. xx. n. 7, Böckh, n. 9029), of Sergius, bishop of Therme (Id. n. 9045), of Antonius, metropolitan of Catana (Ficoroni, tab. xvi. n. 4, Böckh, n. 9001), and of Paul, archbishop of Thessalonica (Ficoroni, tab. ix. n. 1, Böckh, n. 9037).^j

Leaden bulls of ecclesiastics of lower rank than bishops have rarely been found. We have, however, one in England of archdeacon Boniface, supposed to be contemporary with Wilfrid (died A.D. 709). It reads on obv. + || BONI || FATH || +; on rev. + || ARCHI || DIAC || + (Hübner, Inscr. Brit. Christ. n. 221).

μόλυβδον, ἀλλὰ τῷ βασιλεῖ τὴν προσκύνησιν καὶ τὸ σέβας ἀπένευεν. Concil. Nic. II. Act. iv.). Leaden bulls of Charlemagne are mentioned by authors (see Heineccius, u. s. p. 44), and some are still in existence; one is rudely figured in the Nouveau Traité de Diplomatie (t. iv. p. 112) published in the last century; another impression from the same mould is here figured from a drawing kindly sent by M. Sambon, who possesses the original.^k Neither specimen is complete, but from a comparison of the two with each other and with a bulla of Charles the Bald, the types and legends on both sides can be satisfactorily made out. On the obverse we have bust of Charlemagne to r., with broad diadem, wearing the paludamentum, with legend: + Jesu (IHV) nate Dei, Carlum defende potenter; on the reverse a cross with open diamond in the centre, each arm terminating in a letter, the four letters being K R L S (Karlus); the legend is + Gloria sit Christo (XPO), regi victoria Carlo. It is not improbable that bullae of lead were employed by other emperors before Charlemagne; but it seems doubtful whether we have any genuine examples now existing in that or any other metal before his time. The silver bulla of Dagobert, detached from its diploma, which is mentioned as being in "gazophylacio ducali Gothano" by Mabillon and others is regarded by Heineccius with suspicion (u. s. p. 41). Polydore Vergil De Inv. Rerum, lib. viii. p. 605 says, that Charlemagne introduced seals (bulls) of gold,

Leaden bulla of Charlemagne. (Size of the original.)

Leaden bullae were likewise employed by secular persons. Those of the Greek emperors in the 8th century are the earliest recorded. Leontius, bishop of Cyprus, argued before the second Nicene council on the veneration paid to the leaden bullae of the Greek emperors to the veneration of images in churches. ὁ κέλυσιν βασιλέως δεξάμενος καὶ ἀσπασάμενος τὴν σφραγίδα οὐ τὸν πηλὸν ἐτίμησεν ἢ τὴν χάρτην ἢ τὸν but neither Heineccius (u. s. p. 33) nor any later writer apparently have ever seen such. In later times both emperors and popes certainly employed them (Heineccius, u. s.).

^j There are also leaden bullae which bear the names of various saints. A curious example, both in Greek and Latin, is given in Ficoroni, tab. xiv. n. 7. On one side is represented a man in the attitude of benediction, Ο ΝΙΚΟΛΑΟΣ being written κιωνηδόν in two lines; on the other is a cross, below which in three lines SIGILL | SCR | NICOLAI (Böckh, n. 9035). Ficoroni and Kirchmann consider that the bull is a seal of some monastery dedicated to St. Nicolas. The British Museum has other examples bearing the figures, names, and titles of the Blessed Virgin, St. Chrysostom, St. George, and St. Theodore, which probably belong to the same category. The dates of all such being uncertain, it must suffice to have alluded to them thus briefly.

In a suit between bishop Wolfkeoz and abbat Cotzpert held before Louis le Débonnaire, a document was produced bearing the seal of Charlemagne. "Quam (chartam) quam piissimus imperator suscepisset, sigillumque sui patris recognoscendo intuitus esset, venerando deosculatus est, circumque astantibus similiter honoris causa deosculandum contradidit" (Ratpert. de Casib. Monast. S. Galli, c. 6, p. 5; quoted by Heineccius, u. s. p. 11). It is not clear whether the diploma had a wax or a leaden seal attached; more probably perhaps the latter. (Cf. Leontius, quoted above.)

The number of leaden bullae belonging to secular persons of inferior rank is very considerable. All or almost all of them were struck in various parts of the Byzantine empire, more especially in Sicily. Many of them bear upon the obverse a cruciform monogram, representing Κύριε, βοήθει τῷ σῷ δούλῳ, or τῷ δούλῳ σου, for which τοῦ σου δούλου is sometimes substituted (O Lord, help thy servant); the reverse bears in Greek the name (often in monogram) of the owner and his office (often in an abbreviated form) in the dative, more rarely in the genitive case: a cross often precedes, and sometimes follows.¹ But few of them comparatively can be dated. Of these we mention the following: A bulla, preserved in the museum of the monastery of St. Nicolai at Catania, bears on the obverse the monogram and legend above-mentioned, and on the other side the name of Sergius, patrician and strategus—Obv. K. (i. e. Κύριε) βοήθει (βοήθει) τῷ δούλῳ σου. Rev. + Σεργίῳ πατρικίῳ καὶ στρατηγῷ +. He is reasonably supposed to be the praetor of Sicily mentioned by Anastasius under the year 733 (Böckh, n. 8988). Another bears the same obverse, and on the reverse "Gregorius, patrician, strategus of Sicily." He is supposed by Castelli and by Kirchmann to be the Gregory who governed Sicily in the beginning of the 9th century (Böckh, n. 8991). Another example (in Mus. Patern. Böckh, n. 8989) has the same obverse, but bears on the reverse the name of John, "patrician and royal spatharius," probably the same as John the proto-spatharius, who was sent to Sicily in the reign of Constantine Porphyrogenitus (A.D. 780-797). A fourth, preserved in the Recupero Museum at Catania, is described by Prof. Salinas from a drawing by Recupero himself. The obverse is as before; the reverse bears the name and titles of Euphemius, "royal spatharocandidatus and strategus of Sicily." The title of royal candidatus occurs on other bullae, mentioned by Salinas, who considers that this Euphemius lived in the reign of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, to whom he also now attributes the gold ring which he figures, mentioned above under RINGS, § 6 B. (Tre anelli, &c., u. s. pp. 4-6.) A fifth bulla in fine, found at Philippeville in Algeria, bears on each side a cross and two pellets; below is written on the obverse the name of Photinus (in the genitive), and on the other his title "stratelates." He appears to be the proto-spatharius and στρατηγὸς τῶν ἀνατολικῶν, who is mentioned by Cedrenus as governor of the province of Sicily in the reign of Michael II. (Böckh, n. 8990).

In much the greater number of cases, however, there is no indication of date; as for example in one preserved at Syracuse, which has the obverse so often mentioned, and on the reverse "Andreas, hypatus" (consul), "and strategus. Amen" (Böckh, n. 8998). Another example, in the possession of the writer, from the Lovati collection, has the obverse as before, while the reverse has "Leo notarius" (in genitive). Another from the same collection has the same obverse in the dative, and on the reverse "Antonius notarius" also in the dative. Many other names of officers of the Byzantine court occur on the bulls which are figured and described in Böckh's work. The British Museum also contains a large number of such.^m But it is unnecessary to multiply examples here, not only because their date is doubtful, but also because their interest is rather secular than ecclesiastical.

(2) A sacred Sign, especially the Sign of the Cross.—The word seal is used for the sign of the cross with which the bread in the eucharist is signed. In the liturgy of St. Chrysostom the priest takes the oblation (προσφοράν) with his left hand and the holy lance (ΛΑΝΓΕ) with his right, and with it sealing (σφραγίζων) over the seal (σφραγίς) of the oblation, he says thrice: "In memory of our Lord and God and of our Saviour Jesus Christ." Heineccius (u. s. p. 18) notes from Goar that this seal is the sign of the cross impressed on the host or oblation, as is seen in Arcudius, and in the figures annexed. He likewise observes that the sign of the cross is frequently termed σφραγίς in early and mediaeval Greek writers, whether used in baptism, or ordination or in the eucharist, or elsewhere. The tonsure of ecclesiastics is also so called. (See Goar, Euchol. Graec. pp. 117, 321; Suicer, Thes. s. v. σφραγίς; Ducange, Gloss. Med. et Inf. Graec. s. v. σφραγίς.)

(3) Solomon's Seal used as a Charm.—On an amulet of red copper, pierced for suspension, found at Keff in Tunis, described at length under MEDALS, part of the legend of the obverse runs thus:—Invidia (invidia) invidiosa (invidiosa) nihil (nihil) tibi ad. (adimat?), anima pura et munda Quirince; sata malina (maligna) non tibi praevaleat [n]t. Lijabit te Dei brachium, Dei et Christi, et Signum et Sigillum Solomoni [n]t. PAXCASA. (= Abraxas?) Perhaps we should read Dei et Christi signum (i. e. the cross). Considered by M. Reuvens to be "assez récent." It may possibly be as late as the conquest of Africa in the 8th century by the Arabs, in whose view Solomon was a great magician, and from whom the Christians there may have derived it; this however is not certain, as there are gems (haematite) very similar to some coins of the 4th century; they bear a horseman spearing a fallen enemy, with legend ΣΟΛΩΜΩΝ (Solomon), and on the other side ΧΡΑΤΙΣ ΘΕΟΥ (the Seal of God), with mystic characters. (Writer's collection; others nearly similar in Brit. Mus.; one side of a bad specimen figured in King's Gnostics, pl. vi. n. 7). The seal of Solomon is said to be the pentalfa, or star of five rays formed by intersecting triangles (Kirch. Oedip. Aegypt. cl. xi. c. vii. t. ii. pars 2, p. 477). Hence the scars on the rhizoma of the Convolvulus multiflora have given to the plant the English name of Solomon's seal. On the medal and on the gem, however, the name Solomon, and the words Seal of God, appear to constitute the charm, the sigil's power being to make the owner victorious. See more on this subject in King, u. s. p. 215, Dict. of Bible, s. v. SOLOMON; Lightfoot's ed. of St. Paul's Epist. to Coloss. Introd. pp. 91, 92, note.

SEASONS, THE FOUR. This is one of the adopted subjects of Christian art. The seasons had long been a favourite subject of Roman decoration, of the most pleasing character, and connected with rural and pastoral imagery, so that the church soon invested them with associations of her own. To the heathen they furnished matter for contemplation on life, change, growth and decay; in Christian thought the hope of the resurrection was added; and pictures of sowers, reapers, and vinedressers would have their definite meaning for all who knew the Lord's parables. And these pictures are so frequently (almost invariably in fact) associated with the form of the Good Shepherd, that it is impossible to doubt their Christian import, at an early date. It is not here as with single emblems, like the peacock, lion or eagle, which have no special thread of meaning to connect them either with the Scriptures, or with Christian imagery unquestionably derived from Holy Scripture.

The customary use of this subject seems to have died away, perhaps with a parallel decline to that of the Good Shepherd (see s. v.). The Seasons in the catacomb of Domitilla, or St. Nereus and St. Achilles, were perhaps the earliest frescoes of which any remains are left (see Fresco); also Parker's Photographs, No. 1820, 618, 619, and text, p. 123). The present paintings are evidently restorations of the roughest kind. Another fine example is in the Callixtine catacomb (Bosio, p. 223; Bottari, tav. lv.), where the figures are in pairs on each side of the Good Shepherd. "Winter" is a woodman by his fire; "Autumn," a vintager, almost nude; "Summer," a well-clad reaper; "Spring," a young man, only clad in a scarf, and gathering roses. The cemetery of St. Prætextatus contains another set, perhaps equal in antiquity to those of St. Domitilla, and of the character of early 2nd century work at latest. They are arranged in beautiful decorative forms round the vaulting, and on the walls below the arches of the cemetery. Laurels, vines and grapes, corn-ears and roses, represent the seasons above; and there are four corresponding agricultural scenes on the walls, of realistic treatment, but ornamentally arranged with great skill. These were undoubtedly types in use among the heathen; but then all Christian symbols alike, except the anagrammatic fish, appear to have been more or less employed thus at earlier or later dates, and in variously secular senses.

Martigny gives woodcuts of the Four Seasons, here reproduced, from the cemetery of St. CHRIST. ANT.—VOL. II.

Pontianus. They form four compartments of a cupola-vault, grouped round the Good Shepherd in the centre. "Spring" is a boy, bearing a lily and a hare; "Summer," a reaper; "Autumn," a vintager applying a ladder to a tree (showing the Italian way of culture rather than the Greek training to stakes and frames); "Winter," a young man by a fire, holding a torch in his left hand, and in his right (perhaps) a billet of wood. Martigny refers to a sculpture from the cemetery of St. Agnes (Boldetti, Cimit. p. 466; Maffei, Gemm. Ant. part. iv. No. 58, 59), where "Winter" bears a leafy bough and a bird. This subject exists in sculpture, on the ends of the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus. Bottari, tom. i. capo della prefaz., and Buonarroti (Vetri, p. i.) has published a sepulchral urn which bears it also. [R. St. J. T.]

SECLUSION. One of the penalties imposed upon penitents in the seventh and two following centuries was incarceration. It was a penal sentence, and distinct from the voluntary profession of monasticism undertaken to expiate a great crime. The practice arose on the decay of public penance. One of the earliest instances of the imposition of the penalty is in Spain. The Conc. Narbonens. A.D. 589 (c. 6) decreed that any clergyman or citizen of position convicted of crime was to be sent to a monastery for correction. In the 11th Council of Toledo, A.D. 675, c. 7, "retrusio" is coupled with exile as among the recognised punishments inflicted by the church. Nor was this mode of penance confined to the Peninsula; it became common throughout the West. Thus pope Gregory II. 715-731, in a letter (Ep. ii.) to the emperor Leo the Isaurian, contrasts the spiritual with the civil penalties: the state, he says, executes or tortures a criminal, but the church shuts him up in the "secretarium," the vestry or the chapter-house, that he may purge his soul by fasts and vigils. The sentence of incarceration occurs also among the decrees of a synod held under Boniface, A.D. 742, the decisions of which were confirmed in the following year by Conc. Liptin.: any Christian guilty of fornication was to do penance in prison on bread and water; an ordained priest guilty of the same sin was to be flogged and remain two years in prison; a monk or cleric was to be beaten thrice and shut up; and a nun who had fallen was to be confined and have her head shaved. The same discipline is apparent in the rituals of that period. The Gelasian Sacramentary, under the title "Ordo agentibus publicam penitentiam," directs a penitent to be taken in the morning of the first Wednesday in Lent, and to be shut up till Holy Thursday, when he was to be brought into the church; and among the rubrical directions for the Mass on "Feria 5, in Coen. Dom.," the penitents are instructed to come out from the retreat where they have performed their penance. Similar rubrics are contained in the Ordo Romanus, and in pseudo-Alcuin de Divinis Officiis, cap. de Coen. Dom., and in an ancient Toulouse Pontifical of the 9th century (Morin, de Poenitent., appendix, p. 599), where the penitent is ordered to be shut up "in loco secreto" throughout Lent. In the Penitential of Theodore (I. vii. 1) lifelong confinement in a monastery is ruled to be the appropriate penalty for an accumulation of mortal sins. Compare Poenitentiale Cummeani, xiv. 1, and the early British penitential fragment "Sinodus Aquilonalis Britt." cc. 1, 2 (Wasserschleben, Die Bussord. p. 103). The discipline of imprisonment was enforced also against the Canonici. Thus the rule of Chrodegang of Metz (c. 28) orders the seclusion of the collegiate clergy when under penance in terms identical with the directions of the Rituals. In the case of the secular clergy, after monastic houses had become general, it was a common punishment to confine an offending clerk in a monastery, either for a term of years or for the remainder of his life. This mode of seclusion was appointed both by civil and ecclesiastical law. Justinian's Novell. cxxiii. 20 direct that a presbyter or deacon giving false evidence, shall, in place of being scourged, be deposed and shut up for three years in a monastery. The Council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 50), orders the seclusion to be lifelong when either forgery or perjury has been committed by a clergyman: a similar penalty was attached by 3 Conc. Aurelian. c. 7, to adultery; and by 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 29, to magic and soothsaying. See Conc. Epaon. c. 22; 7 Conc. Tolet. c. 3; 8 Conc. Tolet. c. 6. By the second Council of Seville, A.D. 618 (c. 3), a clergyman deserting his benefice was to be confined temporarily in a monastery. Monks who subjected themselves to penance were still further secluded by confinement in the cells or "ergastula" of their monastery. Syricius (Ep. i. 6) imposes this penal confinement upon monks or nuns who, in spite of their monastic profession, have contracted what were held to be incestuous marriages. See Conc. Tarracon. c. 1; Conc. Autissiod. c. 23; Conc. in Trull. c. 41. The severity of the austerities to which delinquent monks were exposed when under confinement may be gathered from the account given in the Scalae of Johannes Climacus, grad. 5. [G. M.]

brethren," and a mutual intercession followed, "that it might be sursum corda with them, as it was already with him" (Amalarius); he then turned to the altar, and prayed with a low voice, so as only himself could hear the words, over the oblations. To this prayer, or these prayers, was given the name of secretaria or secretæ. In the Clementine liturgy, the bishop was enjoined to pray silently, as well as the priests present, before he commenced the more solemn part of the service (εὐχόμενος οὐκ καθ' ἑαυτὸν ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς, Apost. Const. viii. 12). The Council of Laodicea, rehearsing the order of service (can. 19), says, "After the catechumens have retired, then the prayers of the faithful are to be made in three parts, the first with silence (εὐχὴ διὰ σιωπῆς), and the second and third with acclamation (διὰ προσφωνήσεως); then the kiss of peace is to be given," &c. Many of the fathers mention this prayer, and the titles of it as found in the liturgy of St. Chrysostom are given above.

Some (e.g. Bossuet) have conjectured that the word secretaria is derived from the secretio (secerno), i.e. after the separation from the rest of the offerings of what was reserved for the eucharistic sacrifice, or after the separation of the catechumens from the faithful; but without ground, for the ancient sacramentaries, as well as the Greek, agree in the other interpretation, which is further proved by the Book of Tours, where we find these prayers called (not secretæ, but) arcanae. The word is also used as an adjective, as in the Sacramentary of Bobio, "collectio secretæ." The prayers were sometimes called secretâ, i.e. submissâ (voce). Indeed Amalarius and other writers put it beyond all question by the rationale of the practice they supply. Thus Rupertus (de Divin. Offic. c. 4) says, "The priest therefore standing in silence, and silently (tacite) saying the prayer over the oblations, prepares the holy sacrifice, because our Lord also, when He hid Himself, meditated the saving mystery of His own Passion. The silence of the priest designates the hiding-place of Christ. The priest says some things secretly, because, about the Passion of Christ, His disciples did not confess Christ but secretly." And so Amalarius (de Ecc. Offic. iii. 32): "The prayer is called secretæ, as being said secretly. In this the priest prays to be purged at the present time. It belongs to the priest alone, to offer sacrifice to God alone. And, therefore, because we speak out of our thoughts, no resounding voice is necessary, but words for this purpose alone, that the priest may be reminded what he ought to think." The same was put into verse by Hildebert, archbishop of Tours (see Durantus, de Rit. Ecc. ii. 29). See AMEN, 2. p. 75.

At the end of this "secret" prayer the priest, raising his voice (ἐκφώνως, Lit. St. Chrys.), then said the collect, "super oblata," and then proceeded aloud.

"The Leonian Sacramentary, as it has come down to us, provides proper prayers to be said over the gifts at the different days and seasons. They have no rubric or title, but in the later Gelasian are called secretæ, in the Gregorian super oblata. The fact of their being said privately by the priest, and the frequent reference in them to the intercession of the saints, shew that they were not truly primitive. Yet the position of some may be justified by regarding them as a secret prayer of entrance on the whole sacrificial action of the liturgy. God is now besought to accept the elements for the holy use to which man is devoting them." (Scudamore, Not. Euc. pp. 371, 372.) Martene treats of this part of the ritual (vol. iv. lib. ii. cap. 2, § 29). [H. B.]

SECRETARIUM. Another name for the sacristy or diaconicum in the Latin church. The Council of Agde (can. 66) forbids lay officials "insacrati ministri" to enter the secretarium, called by the Greeks diaconicum, and touch the sacred vessels. The Saxon translation of the word in the passage of Bede (H. E. ii. 1) which records the burial of pope Gregory is "husel-portice," Eucharistiae porticus, i.e. the place where the eucharistic vessels were kept (Bevereg. Pandect. vol. ii. p. 76, annotat.). Dionysius Exiguus, in his Latin translation of the canons of Laodicea, writes, "quod subdiaconi a diacono, i.e. secretario sint remoti." In the West the secretaria were frequently large apartments sufficient for the reception of a considerable number of people. Councils were not uncommonly held in them. Thus the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth councils of Carthage were held "in secretario basilicæ restitutæ," and that of Aachen in 836 "in secretario basilicæ S. Mariæ quod in Lateranis dicitur" (Cossart, xiv. 67; cf. Greg. Turon. lib. v. c. 19). The second Council of Arles, A.D. 452 (can. 15), ordained that "in secretario diacono inter presbyteros sedere non liceat" (Labbe, Concil. iv. 1013). The word is sometimes used for the council itself, e.g. "venturo secretario," "praeterito secretario." Presbyters also sat in them to receive the salutations of the laity, or to hear and settle disputes. St. Martin sat in one "secretarium" while "in alio secretario presbyteri sederent, vel salutationibus vacantes, vel audiendis negotiis occupati" (Sulp. Sever. lib. iii. Dial. ii. c. 1). The "secretarium" also sometimes served as a lodging room. St. Martin slept there, and on his departure the virgins of the church rushed in and licked the place where he had sat, and parted the straw of his bed among them as a sacred treasure (ibid.). Paulinus of Nola describes the purpose of the two "secretaria" of his basilica, one as a vestry or sacristy, the other as a place of devout study, in the following lines.

To the right of the apse,

"Hic locus est veneranda penus qua conditur, et qua Promitur alma sacri pompa ministerii;"

and to the left,

"Si quem sancta tenet meditandi in lege voluntas Hic poterit residens sacris intendere libris."

Epist. XII. ad Severum.

Muratori says (Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. xxii.) that in the older Roman basilicas the "secretarium" was usually placed towards the lower end of the nave to the south, i.e. on the man's side. An oratory was sometimes attached to it, as that at the Vatican dedicated to St. Gregory, and at the Lateran to St. Thomas. Here the popes robed themselves before the high festivals, and went thence to the altar. This agrees with the Ordo Romanus, which states that when the pope is about to celebrate, he does not go at once to the altar, but proceeds first to the "secretarium," supported by his deacons.

Notices of "secretaria" are frequent in Anastasius. The first place of interment of Leo I. was "in abdito inferioris secretarii" at St. Peter's (Anast. § 163). Gregory IV. rebuilt at St. George's "secretarium diaconiae" (ibid. § 464); Benedict III. rebuilt the baptistery "cum secretario" at St. Mary's Trastevere (§ 572); and Nicholas I. that at St. Mary Cosmedin, and constructed in it a "triclinium cum caminatis" (§ 600). [E. V.]

SECULAR. The question about the word is whether in early Christianity it designated those who were not in holy orders, or those who were not living under monastic rule.

No very early passage is forthcoming in which the secular is contrasted with the monastic life. Even after the rise of the Benedictine system we find the term secular contrasted not with regular as applied to those living under monastic rule, but rather to ecclesiastic; for in the sixteenth Council of Toledo (A.D. 693) secular is applied to such as are not priests or bishops (sacerdotes, can. 6). So, again, in the fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 633) the term secular seems almost equivalent to layman: "Quicunque ex secularibus accipientes poenitentiam totonderunt se, et rursus praevaricantes laici effecti sunt . . ." (can. 55). Yet at this period the word seems to be hovering about its later sense as describing those who are unprofessed, for in the same council we have the following language: "Duo sunt genera viduarum, saeculares et sanctimoniales. Saeculares viduae sunt, quae adhuc disponentes, laicalem habitum non deposuerunt" (Conc. Tol. iv. can. 56). In the 8th century we find the term secular in the modern sense, as distinguished from regular: "Ut si quis secularium sanctae professionis famulatum subire desiderat, non antea tonsurae habitum suscipiat, quam illius conversatio ac morum qualitas secundum monasticæ regulæ definitionem manifestius probetur" (Concil. Cloveshor. ii. c. 24).

The word secular as applied to those who do not live in the monastery is found in those sermons, ad Fratres in Eremo, which pass under the name of Augustine. It is now, however, generally understood that these sermons are the production of an author long subsequent to the great Latin father, so that we cannot affirm that secular was used in its technical sense so early as St. Augustine's day. SEE (Lat. sedes; Fr. siège). The history of the word sedes, in ecclesiastical usage, is exactly parallel to that of the word CATHEDRA (q. v.). Designating first simply a seat, especially a seat of dignity, it came to be especially applied to the seat of a bishop, and thence to the city in which he had his throne. Thus St. Augustine speaks of the cities, the churches of which had apostles for founders, as "sedes apostolicae," and in later times "sedes" came to designate what we call a "cathedral church." [DIOCESE.] [C.]

SELEUCIA, COUNCILS OF (SELEUCIENSIA CONCILIA); four in all. (1) A.D. 359, at which the Acacians or pure Arians were condemned by the semi-Arians. The formula composed by the latter is given in Latin by Mansi (iii. 315-326.)

(2) A.D. 410; but this was at the Persian Seleucia, where forty bishops and metropolitans are said to have met on Christmas Day, and passed twenty-two disciplinary canons, or, according to the Latin version of them published by Muratori, twenty-seven. But unless this Latin version misrepresents them seriously, its bare perusal more than confirms the doubts of their genuineness which he throws out (Mansi, ib. 1165-1174).

(3) In Persia likewise, but of the Nestorian body, when Acacius, their patriarch, whom Barsumas, the metropolitan of Nisibis, had accused of incontinence, proved his innocence. (Mansi, viii. 1173-1176.) The authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates (i. 148) make two synods of this, and assign different work to both.

(4) A.D. 576, in Persia, and composed of Nestorians once more, whose bishops and metropolitans, it is said, requested their catholicos Ezekiel "ut fidem legesque Apostolorum patrumque occidentalium ipsis rursus ponere et confirmare dignaretur, quemadmodum predecessores ejus catholici facere consueverunt." This is too like the ground alleged by the bishops who formed the first of these Persian synods to be the effect of chance; but of the thirty-nine canons attributed to this synod, we have barely the headings of one-third to judge from. (Mansi, ix. 873.) [E. S. Ff.]

SELEUCUS (1), Feb. 16, martyr with Pamphilius and others at Caesarea, in the Diocletian persecution (Basil. Menol.).

(3) Sept. 15, martyr; commemorated in Galatia (Syr. Mart.). [C. H.]

SEMANTRON*, or SEMANTERION (σήμαντρον, σημαντήριον, also τὸ ξύλον, τὰ ἱεραξύλα), substitutes for bells in the Greek church, usually of wood, sometimes of iron or brass. Goar (Euchol. 560) speaks of them as "perticae e ligno oblongae." There is so little change in the ritual of the Greek church that the present form of the "semantra" which are in daily use in the monasteries, under the name of "simandro,"^b to call the monks to service, is probably that originally adopted. Neale describes a "semantron" as "a long, well-planed piece of timber, usually heart of maple, from 12 ft. and upwards in length, by 1½ ft. broad, and 9 in. in thickness." In the centre of the length, each edge is slightly scooped out to allow the priest to grasp it by the left hand, while he holds a mallet in the right, with which "he strikes it in various parts and at various angles, eliciting sounds not altogether unmusical." The semantra are usually suspended by chains from a peg in the proaulion (Neale, Hist. of Holy East. Ch. Introd. p. 217). The word for striking or sounding the σήμαντρον was the kindred verb σημαίνειν, either alone or with ξύλον, and also κρούειν. Κρούσμα was used as the sound itself. Thus we find that the joy felt at Constantinople on the translation of the relics of St. Anastasius was shewn τὰ ἱερα ξύλα σημάναντες (Concil. Nic. ii. Sess. iv. Labbe et Cossart, xiii. 22). In the Life of St. Theodosius the archimandrite, given by Moschus (Prat. Spirit.), we read of some Eutychian monks of the party of Severus, who, to disturb the saint at his devotions, "beat the wood" at an unwonted hour, and of Theodosius beholding Nonnus praying, with a star over his head, πρὸ τοῦ κρούσαι τὸ ξύλον (ibid. §§ 73, 74). St. Sabas rose for his devotions before the hour of striking, πρὸ τῆς τοῦ κρούσματος ὥρας (Cyril. Seythop. Vit. S. Sab. §§ 43, 59). The officer whose duty it was to sound the semantron was the candle-lighter, κανδηλάπτης.

Though usually of wood, the "semantra" were sometimes of iron, ἀγιοσίδηρα, or of brass.

* An elegant epigram on a semantron is extracted by Neale (p. 219) from Allatius and Englished by himself.

^b The vignette on the title-page of Curzon's Monasteries of the Levant represents the beating of the Simandro in the outer court of a monastery.

These were formed of slightly curved metal plates, and gave out a sound not unlike that of a gong.

Semantra were of different sizes, larger and smaller; σ. μέγα, σ. μικρόν. Thus we read in the Typicon S. Sabas, κανδηλάπτης κατεθάν σημαίνει τὸ μικρόν (c. 1); σημαίνει σήμαντρον μικρόν καὶ συναγόμεθα ἐν τῷ νύκτῳ ψάλλοντες (ibid. 57); and again, κανδηλάπτης ἐξέρχεται, καὶ σημαίνει τὸ μέγα (ibid. c. 1). The smaller were sounded first, then the larger (Goar, Euchol. p. 473), which were followed by those of iron. Theodore Balsamon, in a treatise devoted to the subject, compares the sounding of the little, great, and iron "semantra" to the preaching of the law and of the gospel, and the last trump. He says also that the congregations were summoned by three "semantra" in monasteries, and only by one large one in parish churches.

The slow deep notes, at long intervals, produced from the "semantra" at funerals, were called αἱ βαρεῖαι, and the striker was said κρούειν τὰς βαρεῖας (Goar, Euchol. p. 560).

"Semantra," from their size and shape, furnished formidable weapons, and were sometimes so used with fatal effect in a church brawl (Mich. Glyc. Annal. p. 302; Scylitzes, p. 637). [E. V.]

SENATOR, Sept. 26, martyr; commemorated at Albanum (Mart. Usuard., Hieron.). [C. H.]

SENATORIUM. A term used in the ancient Roman ordines to designate the part of the church which was reserved for nobles. It was on the south side of the church opposite the part assigned to women. When the oblations were made by nobles, the pope or priest descended into the senatorium to receive them. The emperors, however, took their oblations to the altar itself. From the use of the term by Martene (de Eccl. Rit. I. iv. x. 4, vol. i. p. 155, fol.), it appears that at Rome the senatorium was that part of the church which was occupied by (what we should call) the aristocracy. When the pope was going to distribute the sacrament, after communicating those who were in orders, "descendit in senatorium, ubi magnates Eucharistia reficiebat." [H. T. A.]

SENCUS MOR, a collection of ancient Irish laws, modified from the pagan code to meet the Christian requirements. It is the embodiment of ante-Christian Brehon law, and, with its additions, interpretations, and glosses, has formed the authoritative Brehon code from a very early date down even to the 16th century. But the time and circumstances of its compilation are matters of dispute. Ancient tradition and its present Introduction attribute it primarily to St. Patrick, who had acquired sufficient influence to procure a purgation of the pagan laws, and the infusion into them of a milder tone and purer Christian principles. This was between the sixth and the ninth years after St. Patrick's arrival, and in the reign of Laeghaire, monarch of Ireland (A.D. 428-463). The Irish Annals of Ulster and Annals of Tigernach give the exact year, A.D. 438 (O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Script. ii. 101; iv. 1), a date which may point to the theory of the compilation as presented below. Nine are said to have been engaged together in the work, viz. three kings, Laeghaire, with Core king of Munster, and Daire, a chief in Ulster; three bishops, St. Patrick, Benignus his successor at Armagh, and Cairnech of Tuilen; and three poets or judges, Rossa, son of Trichem, Dubhthach mac Ua Lugair, and Ferghus (Senchus Mor, i. p. 5). This would assign the original draft of the Senchus Mor to about the middle of the 5th century, and the memory of St. Patrick's connexion with it was perpetuated by the deep reverence ever paid to its constitutions, and the name given to it of "Cain Patraic" or Patrick's law. It was also called Νομμος or Νομμος, the knowledge of the Nine (Senchus Mor, i. 17).

But this Patrician origin has been keenly disputed (Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 7, § 15), and had objections raised to it on the score of history and chronology (Petrie, Hist. and Antiq. Tara Hill, pass.; Trans. Roy. Ir. Acad. xviii. 52 sq.; Todd, St. Patrick, 482 sq., following Petrie). Its critics and opponents would grant it Christian authority, but of a date later than St. Patrick's time. But in the edition of the Senchus Mor (published under direction of the Commissioners for publishing the Ancient Laws and Institutes of Ireland, 3 vols. Lond. 1865 sqq.) the editor, Mr. W. Neilson Hancock, has met these objections and upholds the Patrician origin, while he shews that much has since been added, and allusions are made in it to interpretations and Brehon judgments of a much later date. The era of St. Patrick was peculiarly appropriate for the codification of the Brehon laws in Ireland, especially at the instance of a Roman citizen who had newly arrived from the Continent, where a similar process upon the Roman civil law was being carried out with all the weight of the imperial authority. The Theodosian Code received the imperial sanction in A.D. 438. (O'Curry, Lect. Man. and Cust. Anc. Ir. ii. 24 sqq., and Lect. MS. Materials of Anc. Irish Hist. 16. 91, ed. 1873; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 132-34 n.; Keating, Gen. Hist. Ir. B. ii.)

The Senchus Mor (derived from the Celtic root sen, old, and mor, in recognition of its authority) is in no sense an historical treatise, but is a body of laws, criminal, commercial, social, military and agrarian, containing the original text with a large collection of glosses, interpretations, and Brehon refinements. It is interesting as a record of ancient law, and doubly valuable as shewing the mellowing influences of Christianity upon heathenism. [J. G.]

SENIOR, a presbyter or priest, one belonging to the second order of the Christian ministry. The usage arose from the more common rendering of πρεσβύτερος in Scripture. Thus in Acts xv. 6 the early version gives "Apostoli et seniores" (Sabatier, Bibl. Sac. Vers. Ant. iii. 549), and this is preserved by St. Jerome; similarly ib. 22 (Sab. 552; Hieron.) or 23 (ib.), xvi. 4 (Sab., Hier.). In Acts xiv. 2, xv. 23, St. Jerome gives presbyteros. The word is used in this sense by Tertullian (Apol. 39), Firmilian (Ep. ad Cyp. n. 75 inter Epp. Cyp. ed. Ben, "seniores et praepositi" = priests and bishops), and Paulinus (Ep. 4 ad Amand., "nomine officioque seniores.") It occurs also in the Missale Francorum, ("Probet se esse seniore" (Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 307), and the Missale Gallicanum Vetus of Thomasius and others, "Aedificet sacerdotes (the bishops) exaltet seniores, illustret Levitas" (the deacons) (ibid. 337). The prayers in which these occur are probably earlier than the codices in which we find them. We may mention, however, that so late as the beginning of the 7th century Gregory I., writing to a bishop in whose diocese Greek was spoken, uses the direct equivalent to the Greek term, "consensus seniorum et cleri" (Epist. ad Joan. Panorm. xi. 51). Compare PATRON, p. 1577. [W. E. S.]

SENNES (1), July 30, martyr at Rome, with Abdon, Persian subreguli, under Decius (Mart. Bed., Metz. Bed., Flor., Usuard.; Vet. Rom., Adon.; Hieron., Notker., Wand.). The Liber Antiphonarius of Gregory has an office for their natale.

(2) Nov. 29, deacon, martyr; commemorated at Rome with the deacons Saturninus and Sisinnius [SATURNINUS (9)]. [C. H.]

SENS, COUNCIL OF (SENONENSE CONCILIIUM), A.D. 601, but the only thing, not purely conjectural, reported of it seems to be that St. Bethar, bishop of Chartres, was favourably received there. (Mansi, x. 485.) [E. S. Ff.]

SEPTEM FRATRES, July 10 (Vet. Rom. Mart.). Their intercessions are prayed for in the Gregorian Sacramentary on July 10. They must be the seven sons of Felicitas (cf. Mart. Bede, July 10). [C. H.]

SEPTEM VIRGINES, April 9; commemorated at Sirmium (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron. giving four only, Wand. giving five). [C. H.]

SEPTIMUNTIA, COUNCIL OF (SEPTIMUNCENSE CONCILIIUM), A.D. 418 (?), one of the many councils of this period in Africa whose canons—in this case six—are known to us only through Ferrandus. (Mansi, iv. 439.) [E. S. Ff.]

SEPTIMUS (1), Aug. 17, monk, martyr, with Liberatus an abbat, and others; commemorated in Africa (Mart. Usuard., Adon.).

(2) Oct. 24, martyr, with Fortunatus, readers, under Diocletian; commemorated at Venusia (Mart. Usuard., Adon.; Vet. Rom.). [C. H.]

SEPTUAGINTA DISCIPULI DOMINI, commemorated on Jan. 4 (Cal. Byzant.).

SEPULCHRE, EASTER. Amongst the many elaborate rites with which the ancient church solemnised the week before Easter was the ceremony of the Sepulchre. It is thus described in the ancient ordinarium of Bayeux: "On Good Friday a 'sepulchre' is prepared, towards the left horn of the altar, with cushion and costly linen. Inside this the bishop buries the cross, the reserved sacrament and the sacramental plate; an appropriate form of service is said; the sepulchre is censed, and closed; when all depart (according to a most ancient Rituale of Poitiers), leaving only two persons to guard the sepulchre, which remains till Easter."

Martene (de Ant. Eccl. Rit. IV. xxiii. 27) only gives examples of this in France and England (Sarum), and he furnishes no particulars from which the date of this singular performance can be inferred. There seems, however, no reason to suppose that it was coeval with the rise of transubstantiation, as it is plain that the practice of "reserving" the sacrament was one that existed centuries before that dogma was formulated. [H. T. A.]

SEPULCHRE, THE HOLY. It is now more than thirty years since the controversy on the site of the Holy Sepulchre was first fairly commenced,—though doubts were thrown upon the traditional site a hundred years ago by the German bookseller Korte. Dr. Robinson renewed the attack in 1842 by arguing that the second wall must have run outside the present church—a thing fatal to its traditions. The Rev. George Williams defended the site, maintaining that not only was there a continuous chain of historical evidence in its favour, but that the second wall could be proved to have run east of the church. Mr. Fergusson, in 1847, advanced the theory that the site was a forgery of the 10th century, the real site being that now occupied by the Dome of the Rock; and Mr. Finlay in the same year attempted a new and ingenious defence of the traditional site, to which we shall presently allude. Since then, many books have been written on one side or the other. Among them are the works of Professor Willis, De Vogüé, De Saulcy, Tobler, and Lewin. Colonel Wilson has produced the ordnance survey of Jerusalem; the rock levels of the city have been almost completely determined by him, Colonel Warren, Lieut. Conder, M. Clermont Ganneau, and Herr Schick; and Professor E. H. Palmer has published a translation of an Arabic historian, which makes the Dome of the Rock to have been built by Abd-el-Melek.

The question divides itself into two: (A) Is the present site that fixed upon by the officers of Constantine? and (B) Was that site certainly, or even probably, the true spot where our Lord was buried?

A. The evidence for the first question is historical and architectural. We propose to cite, as briefly as the subject permits, the chief historical evidence which bears upon the Holy Sepulchre from the Constantinian period.

I. [A.D. 326.] The sepulchre was recovered in the year 326. An account is given in some detail by an eye-witness of the whole event, the historian Eusebius. No doubt whatever has ever been thrown upon his trustworthiness. He says (Life of Constantine, Book iii. chap. xxvi. et seq.):

"It had been in time past the endeavour of impious men to consign to the darkness of oblivion that divine monument of immortality. . . . This sacred cave certain godless persons thought to remove entirely from the eyes of men, supposing in their folly that thus they should be able effectually to conceal the truth. Accordingly, they brought a quantity of earth from a distance with much labour and covered the entire spot; then, having raised this to a moderate height, they paved it with stone, concealing the holy cave beneath this massive mound. Then, as though their purpose had been effectually accomplished, they prepare on this foundation a truly dreadful sepulchre of souls, by building a gloomy shrine of lifeless idols to the impure spirit whom they call Venus.* These devices of impious and wicked men against the truth had prevailed for a long time; nor had any one of the governors, or military commanders, or even of the emperors themselves, as yet appeared with ability to abolish these daring impieties, save only our prince. . . . He gave orders that the place should be thoroughly purified. . . . As soon as his commands were issued, these engines of deceit were cast down, . . . overthrown, and utterly destroyed. . . . Fired with holy ardour, the emperor directed that the ground itself should be dug up to a considerable depth, and the soil . . . transported to a distant place. . . . But as soon as the original surface of the ground under the covering of earth appeared, immediately, and contrary to all expectation, the venerable and hallowed monument of our Saviour's resurrection was discovered. . . .

"Immediately afterwards, the emperor sent forth injunctions granting ample supplies of money, and commanding that a house of prayer worthy of the worship of God should be erected near the Saviour's tomb, on a scale of rich and royal greatness. . . ."

Here follows the letter of Constantine, in which occurs a remarkable passage, the following:—"That the monument of His most holy Passion, so long buried beneath the ground, should have remained unknown for so long a series of years until its reappearance, . . . is a fact which truly surpasses all admiration."

Eusebius resumes the narrative:—

"Accordingly, on the very spot which witnessed the Saviour's sufferings, a new Jerusalem was constructed over against the one so celebrated of old, which, since the foul stain of guilt brought on it by the murder of the Lord, had experienced the last extremity of desolation. It was opposite this city that the emperor began to rear a monument to the Saviour's victory over death. . . .

"First, he adorned the sacred cave itself. . . . This monument, as the chief part of the whole, the emperor's zealous magnificence beautified with rare columns, and profusely enriched with the most splendid decorations of every kind. The next object of his attention was a space of ground of great extent open to the pure air of heaven. This he adorned with a pavement of finely-polished stone, and enclosed it on three sides with porticoes of great length; for at the side opposite to the sepulchre, which was the eastern side, the church itself was erected—a noble work rising to a vast height, and of great extent both in length and breadth."

* A coin of Jerusalem, of the reign of Antoninus Pius, bears upon the obverse a temple of Venus. This coin is engraved in Williams's Holy City.

The description of this church follows:—

"In the next place he enclosed the atrium which occupied the space leading to the entrance in front of the church. This comprehended first the court, then the porticoes on each side, and lastly the gates of the court. This, then, in the midst of the open market-place, the entrance-gates of the whole work, which were of exquisite workmanship, afforded to passers-by on the outside a view of the interior, which could not fail to inspire astonishment."

II. The date of the "recovery" or "discovery" of the tomb, A.D. 326, was seven years before the anonymous Bordeaux Pilgrim visited Jerusalem. The buildings were then in progress, two years before the Dedication. The following is his evidence. Because, in his case, as well as in several others quoted, his words have been translated so as to mean quite different things, the Latin only is given.

He describes the Temple in its ruined condition, where there was shewn an "angulus turris excelsissimæ," the pinnacle of temptation—"ad caput anguli et sub pinnâ turris ipsius, sunt curieola plurima ubi Salomon palatium habebat;" no doubt the substructure still known as Solomon's stables. Colonel Warren has revived the tradition of the pilgrim by placing Solomon's palace on the spot. A remarkable passage follows:—"In loco ipso ubi Templum fuit quod Salomon edificavit, in marmore ante Aram sanguinem Zacharie." What was the Arâ here? And did the pilgrim confuse Hadrian's with Solomon's temple? If the memory of Herod as a builder had so completely perished, why not that of Hadrian? A line or two lower down he says, however, "sunt ibi et stances domus Hadriani!"

From the Temple he takes us to the Holy Sepulchre in the following words:—

"Item, exeunti in Hierusalem, ut ascendas Sion, in parte sinistrâ, et deorsum in valle juxta murum, est piscina, quæ dicitur Siloa. habet quadriporticum . . . Inde eadem viâ ascenditur Sion et paret ubi fuit domus Calaphæ sacerdotis, et columna adhuc ibi est, in qua Christum flagellis cruciebant. Intus autem, intra murum Sion, paret locus ubi palatium habuit David . . . Inde ut eas foris murum de Sion (eundi ad portam Neopolitanam) ad partem dexteram, deorsum in valle sunt parietes ubi domus fuit sive prætorium Pontii Pilati: ubi Dominus auditus est antiquum pareretur. A sinistrâ autem parte est monticulus Golgotha, ubi Dominus crucifixus est. Inde quasi ad lapidem missum est crypta ubi corpus ejus positum fuit et secunda die resurrexit. Idem modo jussu Constantini imperatoris basilica facta est, id est Domitium miræ pulcherrimum, habens ad latus excoptoria unde aqua levatur et balneum à tergo ubi infantes lavantur."

III. [A.D. 335.] The Oremastom places Golgotha on the north of Mount Zion.

IV. [A.D. 350.] While the temple of Venus with its foundations was being cleared away, there might have been, and most probabty was present, a Christian lad, native of Jerusalem, eleven years of age, watching the discovery, which did as much as the great luminous cross which appeared in the sky four years later to confirm the doubtful and strengthen the faithful, that of the rock containing the sacred tomb. It was Cyril, afterwards bishop of Jerusalem. One must not forget that he is the third eye-witness who speaks of these things: that, though he was a boy at the time of the discovery, he lived in Jerusalem, and must have watched, step by step, the progress of the great basilica: that he was ordained before the completion and dedication of the buildings, and that many, if not all, of his lectures were delivered in the church of the Anastasis itself. "The kings of this day," he says, "have in their piety built this holy Church of the Resurrection . . . in which we are assembled."

The statements of fact which have been gathered from Cyril must therefore be admitted, unless there can be shewn any temptation to exaggerate, as exactly true. Four are important. They are as follows:—

(a) "The cleft which was at the door of the salutary sepulchre . . . was hewn out of the rock itself, as is customary here in the front of sepulchres. For now it appears not, the outer cave having been hewn away for the sake of the present adornment: for, before the sepulchre was decorated by royal zeal, there was a cave in the face of the rock."

(b) "Though the place"—outside the sepulchre—"is now adorned, and that most excellently, with royal gifts, yet it was before a garden, and the tokens and traces thereof remain."

(c) "The sepulchre consisted originally of a double cave, of which the exterior was cut away for the sake of the present adornment."

(d) "The entrance . . . was hewn out of the rock itself, as is customary here in the front of sepulchres. Now it appears not: the outer cave or vestibule having been hewn away for the sake of the present adornment; but before the sepulchre was decorated by royal zeal there was a cave in the face of the rock" (Lect. xiv.).

V. Sanctæ Paulæ Peregrinatio (circa A.D. 380). After praying at the Holy Sepulchre, she ascends Sion:—

"Inde egrediens ascendit Sion quæ in arce vel speculam vocatur. Hanc urbem quondam expugnavit et reedificavit David."

VI. P. Eusebii epitome de aliquibus locis Sanctis (A.D. 417):—

"Situs ipse urbis pene in orbem circumactus, non parva pars tunc amittitur, quæ etiam montem Sion, quondam vicinum, jam intra se recipit, qui a meridie positus, pro arce urbi supereminet. Major ceterans pars intra montem jacet a planitie humilioris collis posita."

"Mons Sion latere uno, quod aquilonem respicit, denotans religiosorumque habitatoribus frequentatur: ejus in vertice planitiem monachorum cellulas obtinent ecclesiam circumdantes, quæ dicitur, ut fertur, ab apostolis fundata pro resurrectionis dominicæ reverentia."

"Primum de locis sanctis. Pro conditione platearum divertendum est ad basilicam quam prætorium appellatur a Constantino magni cultu extracta. Dehinc coherentia ab occasu montis Golgothæ atque anastasis: sed anastasis in loco est resurrectionis, Golgotha vero, medius inter anastasis ac martyrion, locus est dominicationis: in quo etiam roper apparet præter quondam ipsam, affixam Domini corpore, crucem pertulit. Atque hæc tum extra montem Sion posita cernuntur, quo se ad aquilonem deficientis loci tumor porrigit. Templum vero in inferiori appears to be a mixture of white and red." He goes on to describe the other churches which then formed the group—the square church of the Virgin Mary, and to the east the large church built on the site of Golgotha. "Under the place of the cross a cave is hewn in the rock, in which sacrifice is offered on an altar." If that is true, what has become of the cave, and how could a cave be cut in the rock east of the platform in the Haram esh-Sherief, where the ground has a slope of one in six? Adjoining the church of Golgotha to the east again was the basilica of Constantine—the Martyrion. Between the Anastasis and the Martyrion Arculf speaks of an open space, doubtless that described by Eusebius.

This description, with the rude plan which accompanies it, is evidently one extracted, so to speak, by numberless eager questions. Adamnanus wished above all things to form a clear idea in his own mind of the most holy of holy places.

XI. [A.D. 690.] The Dome of the Rock, which is according to Mr. Fergusson's theory Constantine's erection, over the Holy Sepulchre was built, according to Arabic historians, in this year by Abd-el-Melek. Three Arabic writers—Jelal-ed-Din, Kemel-ed-Din, and Mejr-ed-Din—agree in describing the erection by the Khalif. Prof. E. H. Palmer has given a full account from these sources in his History of Jerusalem (p. 79 et seq.). Eutychius, himself of Arab extraction, also ascribes the Dome to Abd-el-Melek.

XII. [A.D. 800.] The church of the Holy Sepulchre was given by Haroun-al-Raschid to Charlemagne.

XIII. [A.D. 765.] After the death of St. Willibald, who visited Jerusalem four times, the last about the year 765, a description of the sacred places was written by his biographer, apparently from his own narrative. It is found in the Acta Sanctorum, and is quoted by Mr. Fergusson, Canon Williams, and Professor Willis. As in the case of the Bordeaux Pilgrim, the words have been used by controversialists to support opposite views: "Et inde venit ad Hierusalem in illum locum ubi inventa fuerat sancta crux Domini. Ibi nunc est ecclesia in illo loco qui dicitur Calvariae locus: et haec fuit prius extra Hierusalem; sed Helena quando invenit crucem, collocavit illum locum intus intra Hierusalem.

"Et ibi stant nunc tres cruce lignee foris in orientali plaga ecclesiae, secus parietem, ad memoriam sanctae crucis dominicae et aliorum qui cum eo crucifixi erant. Illae non sunt nunc in ecclesia sed foris stant sub tecto extra ecclesiam: et ibi secus est ille hortus in quo fuit sepulchrum Saluatoris. Illud sepulchrum fuerat in petra excisum, et illa petra stat super terram et est quadrans in uno et in summo subtilis.

"Et stat nunc in summitate illius sepulchri crux et ibi supra nunc aedificata est mirabilis domus et in orientali plaga in illa petra sepulchri est ostium factum per quod intrant homines in sepulchrum orare. Et ibi est intus lectus, ubi corpus Domini jacebat . . . Ille lectus in quo corpus Domini jacebat stat in latere aquilonis intus in petra sepulchri et homini est in dextra manu quando intrat in sepulchrum orare. Et ibi ante januam sepulchri jacet ille lapis magnus quadrans in similitudine prioris lapidis quem angelus revolvit ab ostio monumenti."

XIV. About the year 870 the monk Bernhard visited Jerusalem. The following is his account of the second group of buildings:—

"Recepti sumus in hospitale gloriosissimi imperatoris Caroli, in quo suscipiuntur omnes qui causâ devotionis illum adeunt locum linguâ loquentes Romanâ; cui adjacet ecclesia in honore sanctae Mariae, nobilissimam habens bibliothecam studio praedicti imperatoris, cum xii. mansionibus, agris vineis, et horto in valle Josaphat. Intra hanc civitatem, exceptis aliis ecclesiis, quatuor eminent ecclesiae mutuis sibi met parietibus cohaerentes, una videlicet ad orientem, quae habet montem Calvariae et locum in quo reperta fuit crux Domini et vocatur basilica Constantini; alia ad meridiem: tertia ad occidentem, in ejus medio est sepulchrum Domini, habens ix. columnas in circuitu sui inter quas consistunt parietes ex optimis lapidibus; ex quibus ix. columnis iv. sunt ante faciem ipsius monumenti quae cum suis parietibus claudunt lapidem coram sepulchro positum, quem angelus revolvit et super quem sedit post peractam Domini resurrectionem. De hoc sepulchro non est necesse plura scribere cum dicat Beda in historiâ anglorum sua sufficientia . . . Inter praedictas igitur iv. ecclesias est paradisus sine tecto, ejus parietes auro radiant; pavimentum vero lapide struitur pretiosissimo habens in medio sui confinium iv. catenarum quae veniunt a praedictis quatuor ecclesiis in quo dicitur medius esse mundus."

XV. In the year 1010 the group of churches were all destroyed by order of the Khalif Hakeem. Of this fact there seems to be no doubt possible. It is attested by the following writers:—Raoul the Bald, Lib. III. chap. vii.; Ademar; Guido; William of Tyre; Abulfargius; Makrizi; and it is acknowledged by Renaudot, Hist. Patriarcharum Alexandrinorum, and by De Sacy in his Life of the Caliph Hakim Biamr Allah. The churches, it is stated, were destroyed as completely as by Chosroes. It is related that the sepulchre itself was not spared—perhaps they broke the upper portion of the rock.

Scarcely had the buildings been destroyed than the capricious despot gave orders for them to be reconstructed. "Tunc," says Raoul, "de universo terrarum orbe incredibilis hominum multitudo exultanter Hierosolimam pergentes, domui Dei restaurandae plurima detulerunt munera." By the help of the emperor Romanus Argyros and his successor and the offerings of pilgrims, the churches were rebuilt in 1048.

XVI. [A.D. 1102.] It is hardly necessary to quote the long account given by Saewulf of the buildings as they were before the magnificent alterations made by the Crusaders. It is, however, most valuable in shewing what the buildings of the third period were—a circular church, with a group of churches and chapels round it. The description may be read in Prof. Willis's paper on the church (Williams's Holy City, vol. ii. p. 270).

No one has doubted, or ever will doubt, that the group of buildings described by Saewulf occupied the same site as that now covered by the modern church of the Holy Sepulchre. What follows, therefore, has no topographical importance, but affects the question whether the present sepulchre is cut in the rock or built up.

XVII. [A.D. 1125.] The Russian abbot Daniel writes that the rock was, when he visited it, between thirty and forty years after the occupation by the Crusaders, cased in marble, with three circular openings in the front by which the stone might be touched and kissed.

XVIII. [A.D. 1185.] Phocas says that the sepulchre was divided into two parts, in one of which was a polished stone raised a cubit, on which was laid the Giver of Life; and a writer of 1187, just before Jerusalem was recovered by the Saracens, says that within the monument was the rock of the sepulchre. Travellers in 1211, 1322, and 1336 confirm the casing with marble and the three small holes in the southern side, by which the faithful could kiss and touch the rock. In the year 1480 Fabri resolved on examining the monument carefully to see whether any portion of rock remained: he found the wall in which the little door to the sepulchre is formed, to be a naked rock in one piece, without joints, still shewing the marks of tools,—"adhibito lumine petracam parietem vidi, non quadris compositam, sed integram, in qua instrumentorum ferreorum signa manifeste apparent." He concludes from this and other indications that the Holy Sepulchre had been destroyed, but not altogether; that it had been subsequently repaired and covered with marble, to prevent pilgrims from knocking off little bits as relics.

XIX. [A.D. 1555.] Bonifacius, then prefect of the council of St. Francis in Jerusalem, superintended extensive repairs in the church, during which he removed one of the alabaster slabs with which the Holy Sepulchre was covered and exposed the very tomb itself; and shortly after he discovered near Jerusalem, among the rock-cut tombs, one exactly resembling that of the Holy Sepulchre.

XX. Among the many scattered notices of the church and the temple area which have been carefully collected by the Rev. George Williams for his Holy City, we find a few indications of importance. Thus, when Julian's workmen were driven from their work by the "globes of fire," Sozomen says they took refuge εἰς τὸ ἱερόν. What was this ἱερόν? Was it the aedes ipsa mentioned by the Bordeaux Pilgrim ubi Templum fuit quod Salomon aedificavit? Paschasius Radbertus, speaking from information given him by pilgrims, says that the monument (A.D. 848) was cut in rock; that it was all one stone, not many; and that a man could hardly reach to touch the roof. Eutychius (Said ibn Batrik) speaks of great damage done to the churches in the year 936 by the Moslems: "ecclesiae Constantini portas australes incendunt nec non dimidium porticus anno trecentesimo vicesimo quinto (A. H.). . . . Cranii locum cum (templo) Resurrectionis vastaverunt." This is the last fact recorded in his annals, and one can hardly suppose it to have been entirely without foundation. In 1130 the Russian abbot Daniel, as we have already seen, states that the rock was cased in marble, but had three circular openings in the front, through which it might be touched and kissed. William of Baldensel (A.D. 1336) was the first to express a doubt whether the tomb had not been built up. "Illud vero advertendum est quod monumentum . . . non est illud in quo corpus Christi sacratissimum examine primitus est immissum: quia sacro attestante eloquio monumentum Christi erat excisum in petrâ vivâ. Illud vero, ex petris pluribus est compositum de novo conglutinato cremento minus artificialiter et, minus quam deceat, ordinate."

XXI. In the above catena of evidence we have included everything that seems of real importance. There are many other and later accounts of the Holy Sepulchre—that in the Norman French, "La Citez de Jherusalem," which may be found in Williams's Holy City; those of the Inominati and others in Tobler's volume, Palæstinae Descriptiones. But they appear to add no new facts to help in the solution of the question.

Let us sum up the evidence.

It would appear, therefore, that Constantine (see his letter) thought the site had been entirely unknown, but that, according to Eusebius, the memory had been preserved, in spite of the "attempts of impious men;" that the emperor adorned the tomb with pillars, and built a basilica at some little distance from it, leaving the space between open and decorated with columns; that, according to the Onomasticon, Golgotha is north of Zion; that according to the Bordeaux Pilgrim, he who would go to Zion from the Temple must ascend in order to get there,—in which statement he is supported by Paula—also that if he would go outside the town from Zion to the Neapolitan gate, i.e. the gate which leads to Neapolis (Nablûs), the Praetorium of Pilate is on the right, deorsum in valle; that all writers alike, from Cyril, an eye-witness in 326, to Father Fabri, an eye-witness in 1480, declare that the tomb is cut in the rock; that there is room in the sepulchre for nine men standing—not kneeling—the area of the present sepulchre available for standing is from 20 to 26 square feet, just enough for that number; that the height is such as a man can hardly reach with his fingers—it is from 7 to 8 feet; that the churches were destroyed in 614 and rebuilt, probably much after the same plan in 630; that according to a doubtful authority (Cedrenus, who has not been quoted above) the churches were burned at the time when the emperor Nicephorus II. took Damascus and recovered Northern Syria; that in 1010 not only were the churches overthrown but also the sepulchre was partially destroyed, by order of the Khalif Hakeem; that considerable alterations were made by the Latin conquerors; and that from the conquest of Saladin, despite the destruction of the sculptured columns before the sepulchre by the Charezmians in 1244, no great change was made in the church till the fire of 1808 necessitated a rebuilding from the old foundations. Professor Willis has pointed out that these accounts of repeated demolitions, burnings, and reconstructions, should be received with certain deductions. When an immense building or group of buildings is destroyed, it is done generally by the hands of hurried conquerors. The foundations remain, with some of the walls, as may be witnessed to this day on the eastern side of the Tyropæon valley, where stand the stones of Herod's Temple, known as the Jews' Wailing Place. It would be interesting indeed to know what portions, if any, of the present church belong to the first, second, or third group; to trace, as far as possible, the remains of the buildings described by Saewulf; to ascertain what are left of the reconstructions of Modestus; to establish how much is left of the Crusaders' church; and, if possible, to find what belongs to the churches destroyed by Hakeem. This has been attempted by the count de Vogüé in the Églises de la Terre Sainte.

XXII. So far then, from Constantine downwards, the history of the Holy Sepulchre has appeared to most students a clear and continuous record of events which, exaggerated perhaps by the imaginary terrors of eye-witnesses and the zeal of historians, were really enacted around the site where now stands the traditional Holy Sepulchre. But in 1847 objections of an entirely novel kind were raised by Mr. James Fergusson, whose reputation as a student of architecture at once commanded a respectful hearing. He declared, on an examination (1) of the drawings, sections, and plans prepared by Messrs. Bonomi and Catherwood, and (2) after a personal visit to Jerusalem, that the Dome of the Rock, which he called the Masjid or Mosque of Omar, could not have been built by Abd-el-Melek in the 7th century; that not only the Arabs could not have erected such a building, but that no Christian architects of the period could have designed it; that, finally, it belongs, and can only belong, to the time of Constantine.

If of that time, then why have we no account of it? And what else can this splendid and richly ornamented erection be, but the structure placed up by the emperor's command around and over our Lord's place of sepulture?

This revolutionary theory necessitated many others: that the cave under the dome is our Lord's sepulchre; that Zion was also the Temple mount; that the Temple was in the S.W. angle of the Haram; that the eastern wall was built by Agrippa after the Crucifixion; that the second wall might run without the present church; that the northern part of the Haram area was a place of tombs, with other consequences.

Many solutions have been proposed to meet the difficulties of this theory, first started by Mr. Fergusson, but they have never yet been answered with such fulness as to convince him or his followers. Mr. Lewin (Siege of Jerusalem, p. 145) suggested that, when they wanted to build the Dome, the Arabs brought over as many pillars and other ornaments as they required from the church of Constantine over the Holy Sepulchre, on the opposite hill.

The count de Vogüé pronounced the building to be Byzantine in character, the work of Christian artists (Temple de Jérusalem, p. 82): "La disposition de l'édifice, prise dans son ensemble, est toute byzantine: un siècle avant l'hégire, les architectes byzantins bâtissaient des églises polygonales ou rondes, telles que celles de Bostra et d'Ezra, édifices datés du sixième siècle, qui se rattachent eux-mêmes par les églises Constantinienes d'Antioche, de Saint-Constante de Rome, aux temples circulaires de l'antiquité. Sous Abd-el-Melek, les Arabes n'avaient pas d'art qui leur fut propre: ou du moins, s'ils avaient des tendances spéciales, un goût particulier pour telle forme ou tel motif de décoration, ils n'avaient ni écoles ni artistes de profession, et surtout ils n'avaient pas d'ouvriers en état de mener à bonne fin une grande construction: il serait injuste de dire qu'ils n'avaient aucune notion de l'art de bâtir, puisque les villes du centre de l'Arabie sont construites en maçonnerie de pierre et de bois, et certainement ces constructions, sur lesquelles nous manquons absolument de renseignements précis, devaient par quelque côté avoir leur originalité: mais à Jérusalem, en Syrie, en Égypte, dans les pays récemment soumis à leur domination, ils n'avaient que des soldats et des fonctionnaires: pour bâtir les nouveaux monuments de leur culte, ils durent s'adresser aux vaincus, à la population indigène qu'ils avaient convertie en force, mais non changée ni déplacée. Souvent même ils firent venir du dehors les artistes que le pays ne pouvait pas leur fournir: la grande mosquée de Damas fut décorée par des mosaïstes que le Khalife Al-Walid demanda directement à l'empereur d'Orient. . . . Les renseignements historiques manquent sur la nationalité des architectes du Qoubbet es Sakhr, mais le style du monument est un guide au moins aussi sûr que les chroniques arabes et ne laisse aucun doute sur le caractère byzantin de l'édifice. Mais quoique byzantin par le style, il n'a rien de chrétien: le trait principal qui le distingue des églises que lui ont servi de modèle est l'absence d'abside. . . . L'abside est le signe distinctif des églises primitives, et son absence ici prouve que les architectes du Qoubbet es Sakhr, dont en bâtissant suivant les habitudes byzantines, surent donner au monument le caractère musulman."

XXIII. But if the architectural argument of Mr. Fergusson, to shew that the Dome of the Rock is the work of Constantine, has never been disproved to the satisfaction of his followers, it must be also acknowledged that the objections to the corollary to the theory, that it is the monument raised by the emperor over the Holy Sepulchre, have also never been satisfactorily answered.

They are, as may be gathered from the foregoing historical evidence, briefly as follows:—

1. Constantine built no dome or church at all over the sepulchre. He simply ornamented it with columns.
2. It appears certain from the Bordeaux Pilgrim and others that the Zion of the 4th century was on that part of the city where it is now placed.
3. From the Onomasticon it is also certain that Golgotha was on the north of Zion.
4. Cyril says that the tomb had a vestibule, "as is customary here in the front of sepulchres." What sign of a vestibule can be found to the cave of the dome?
5. There was room for only nine men to pray, standing. This exactly fits the present tomb.
6. Paula, after leaving the church, had to ascend in order to get to Zion. How can one ascend from the Dome of the Rock, which is on the top of the hill?
7. How far is the theory that the church is that built by Constantine—even making all allowances for damages at various times, repairs, and additions—compatible with the two complete destructions by Chosroes and Hakem?
8. The time assigned to the proposed transference of the old to the present site, that of the wars between Nicephorus II. and the Khalif Muezz, is that when the passion for pilgrimages was the strongest, and the tide of pilgrims the most continuous. Can we believe, then, that a vast conspiracy—including bishops, priests, monks, pilgrims, and those who came and went each week—should have succeeded in transferring at one coup the whole of the sites, real and legendary, from one part of the city to another; that the conspiracy was joined in by all newcomers while the churches were in process of erection; and that of all the hundreds necessarily engaged in this forgery, not a single one went home and told the tale, not one was found to write it? Nor was it only the pilgrims who would be pressed into complicity with the plot. There were the merchants who flocked every September to the great fair of Jerusalem—regular traders, who came year after year and knew the city, from Byzantium, Genoa, Venice, London, Marseilles, to buy spices, sugar, silks, and rich stuffs. These would have to join in the plot, and might perhaps have done so, being friends and brother Christians. But for the last thirty years of the century, Jerusalem was substituted for Mecca, and an immense number of Moslem pilgrims poured yearly into the Holy City. Was it likely that not one of these merchants, admitting their complicity, should carry home the tale? that not a single hostile Jew—Jerusalem was full of Jews, carrying on a rich trade in dyeing stuffs—should seize the opportunity of a scoff at the Christian? and that not one Mohammedan writer should tell how the worshippers of the Cross had combined together to invent a lie? Such a conspiracy may have been successfully carried through, but it seems most improbable. Such complicity and agreement between hostile fanatics seems impossible.

9. If the Dome of the Rock again was the Church of the Sepulchre, then, for 300 years, we must suppose the Christians and the Moslems entering the same sacred enclosure side by side, as friends, for prayer and worship. Nothing has ever been found in the Haram area itself, or in any book, to warrant the belief of a wall of separation between the Mosque el Alka and the dome.

10. The history of the building of the dome by Abd-el-Melek is as clear and precise as that of the building of St. Paul's by Wren. Three Arab historians relate it with such small difference as tend to shew their general fidelity. It may be urged that these wrote some hundreds of years after the events. That is true. There remains, however, an older record. In the building itself a long Cufic inscription in mosaic runs round the colonnade. "In the name of God . . . the servant of God" (read Abd-el-Melek), "the commander of the faithful, built this dome in the year 72" (A.D. 691).

11. Eutychius (Annales, ii. 289) says that the Christians had built no church "within the area of the Temple," on account of the denunciations of the Lord, and had left it in ruins. The "area of the Temple" in the 10th century was surely the present Haram area.

12. Our Lord's tomb was rock-cut (Luke xxiii. 53), and after the general fashion of tombs in Jerusalem. What resemblance has there been found between the cave under the dome and a Jewish tomb?

13. Lastly, though more objections might be advanced, consider the express statement of the eye-witness Cyril, that the tomb was rock-cut, after the fashion of tombs in Jerusalem, and that it had a vestibule. Couple with this the fact that it had room for only nine men standing, and that there was in it, along the north side, a place open to the south, three palms high, large enough for the body of a man. Now the cave under the dome contains more than 500 square feet; it may possibly be rock-cut, but it certainly has no resemblance to a Jewish tomb; there is no vestibule, and no appearance of there ever having been any; there is no loculus, and no place apparent to the eye where there ever could have been one.

These objections and many others of equal and minor importance may be satisfactorily disposed of, but at present they remain to be met. And there are a large body of those interested in the question, who are content to accept De Vogüé's proposed solution of the architectural difficulty; who can refer all the accounts of pilgrims without difficulty to the present site; who hold that the modern site is that spoken of by Eusebius, Cyril, and the unknown pilgrim from Bordeaux, the three contemporary witnesses.

B. The next question is, whether the site is genuine? Was our Lord really entombed in the place now shewn to visitors and pilgrims?

I. Historically the evidence is very scanty.

The place was "nigh to the city" (John xix. 20); there was a garden in the place where He was crucified (John xix. 41); the sepulchre was in the garden (John xix. 41); it was a rock-cut tomb (Luke xxiii. 53; Mark xvi. 46; Matt. xxvii. 60); it was "without the gate" (Heb. xiii. 12), that is, without the second wall.

There is no other direct evidence on the site of the tomb, though indications may be found, by the light of which theories may be examined. Thus, it will be conceded that the place was a frequented spot, or at least so near the city that it was easily accessible by the crowds who went out to see the Crucifixion; that it was perhaps so near as to be visible from the Temple wall (John xix. 20, 21); that it was probably near a road leading from one of the city gates (Mark xv. 21); and, though this is less probable, that it was near the Gennath gate, or Gate of Gardens.

II. For 300 years there is silence as regards the sepulchre. Early in the 3rd century, in 212, Alexander goes to Jerusalem to see "the holy places" generally. Origen speaks of the cave at Bethlehem as proof of our Lord's birth. Surely, it is argued, if he had known of the sepulchre, he would have seen in that stronger proof still of the Resurrection. On the other hand, it is assumed that he knew of it, but, by reason of the mound of earth erected purposely to hide it, he could not see it.

III. In the absence of evidence we fall back on theory. There are two lines of argument:

1. Those who do not believe in the authenticity of the site contend that the early Christians took no care to preserve the memory of any sacred place; that after their return from Pella they found Jerusalem a heap of ruins, with the tenth legion encamped either upon or close to the modern site (if that was the true one), a fact which by itself would have prevented them from visiting it; that, after the revolt of Barcochebas, the Christians were confounded by the Romans with the Jews, chased from the spot, and only tolerated when they shewed their distinction by electing a Gentile bishop; that the traditions of the past vanished with the Judaizing or Jewish Christians; that the spot chosen for the church was selected from some vague tradition of quite recent growth, from some fancied resemblance of ground, from some remains of gardens, or even by conscious and designed imposture.

2. On the other hand, the supporters of the tradition point out the improbability that such a place as the scene of the Resurrection, the stupendous importance of which has ever been present to all Christian teachers, should be forgotten by those on the spot. They argue that the Christians must have returned to Jerusalem very shortly after the siege, because they were able to elect for their bishop, in the place of the martyred James, Simeon, son of Clopas, brother of our Lord; that although houses and walls may be destroyed, streets and the site of gates remain to mark the places where old associations cling; that the tradition is unbroken; that the words of Eusebius clearly convey the fact that the site was known to all Christians in Jerusalem; and that when the historian speaks of old records from which he compiled his list of the early bishops, he suggests the very records which preserve the memory of the site.

IV. We may here briefly notice the theory, already referred to, of Mr. Finlay. It is this: The whole of the vast Roman empire, he says, had been exactly mapped and planned by the imperial agrimensores, under Augustus. On these maps everything—a group of trees, a garden, a vineyard, or a field—was accurately laid down. Of course, therefore, Mr. Finlay argues, the name of Golgotha or that of the tomb of Joseph would be found, and all Constantine had to do was to order a search in the survey map and send to Jerusalem word where to look for the sepulchre.

This is ingenious, but it hardly satisfies opponents of tradition, who say that it would be absurd to expect in any map the name of one tomb among many, or even the name of a certain obscure place outside the city; that it is not clear that Palestine was regularly re-examined; and that it is perfectly clear from the historian that Constantine pursued no such line at all, being under the impression that the tomb, if not the site, was unknown. On the other hand, the upholders of the site do not want the aid of an argument which requires the concession of so many improbable things.

V. We have, lastly, to notice the topographical argument.

The sepulchre was without the wall; i.e. the second wall, which, starting from Gate Gennath (Gate of Gardens), near the town of Hippus, ran to the fortress of Antonia, in some sort of curve — κυκλούμενον. The course of this second wall has yet to be traced. If it is proved to run outside the sepulchre, then the site must be at once abandoned. In 1862 a portion of a massive wall was found, about 12 feet deep, just south of the church. (Lewin, Siege of Jerusalem, p. 215.) Its stones were about 7 feet long by 5 feet wide, and shewed the well-known marginal draft. In 1874 M. Clermont Ganneau (Quarterly Statement, Palestine Exploration Fund, 1874, p. 145) found and partly traced a scarp which he ingeniously connects with the second wall. At present, however, we may admit that the course of the second wall has never yet been made out to the satisfaction of all. Until it has been followed from end to end, or at least until its foundations and general course have been established beyond a doubt, we cannot say with certainty whether or no the present site is within or “without the gate.”

We may add that the latest writer on the subject, Lieut. Conder, R.E. (Tent Work in Palestine), argues from the rock levels, that the wall must have passed outside the church. He has discovered a place north of the city called the Place of Stoning, which, from the conformation of the ground as well as the name, he suggests as the real site of Golgotha.

There is one fact which makes in favour of the present site. It is that the church stands over at least one tomb of undoubted antiquity, and perhaps stands over many. It has long been suspected that the so-called tomb of Joseph of Arimathea which is shewn within the church was a genuine rock-cut Jewish tomb. Professor Willis states the fact as already proved. Dr. Robinson, however, denied its antiquity. Colonel Wilson (Q. S. notes, p. 53) speaks of the place as an undoubted tomb with rock-cut loculi. M. Clermont Ganneau has proved beyond a doubt (Quarterly Statement, Pal. Explor. Fund, 1877, p. 81) that it was a tomb of the well-known type with three loculi on each side, in which he has been corroborated by Colonel Wilson (Quarterly Statement, 1877, p. 128), and has tried to shew that it is connected with another sepulchre cut in the rock beside it at a lower level. One may fairly argue, therefore, that by whatever means this site was chosen for that of our Lord's sepulchre, whether by transference, or by tradition, or by imposture, it was chosen with the knowledge that here had been a place of tombs. Now the only known tombs within the second wall were those of the kings and the prophetess Huldah.

It will be seen that, while no amount of argument will ever reconcile those who hold opposite views as to the continuity of tradition from the earliest times, the continuity of history from the time of Eusebius appears fairly demonstrable. On the other hand, if it cannot be disproved by architects that the Dome of the Rock is of the age of Constantine, what way out of the difficulty remains but one, that pointed out by Mr. Fergusson, itself bristling with other difficulties? A careful and exhaustive examination of this building on the spot by a thoroughly competent architectural scholar is greatly to be desired. That, indeed, seems the chief thing necessary. The next step, if it should not be the first, is the recovery beyond any doubt of the second wall. These two desiderata accomplished, and the rock-levels of the city—already far advanced—completed, the question of the site of the Holy Sepulchre will be narrowed to one or two issues. [W. B.]

SERMON (Sermo, &c.). The sermon, considered as part of the liturgy, always followed immediately after the Gospel, and thus preceded the dismissal of the catechumens in the Eastern church (Constit. Apost. lib. ii. 57, viii. 4; Ordo Rom. vi. 7). This appears to have been its liturgical position from the very earliest times. Justin Martyr, describing Christian worship in the 2nd century, says, "When the reader (of the lections) has finished, the priest (προεστώς) admonishes and exhorts by word of mouth (δὲ λόγου) to the imitation of these noble deeds" (Apol. i. 65-67). Later on the first council of Orange is quoted as alluding to the place of the sermon as "intra missarum sollemnia habitum." Caesarius of Arles used sometimes to order the doors to be shut after the Gospel, to prevent people going out before the sermon (Cyprian Telonens. Vit. S. Caesar. lib. i. § 19). St. Gall (7th century) is recorded to have preached the consecration sermon after the Gospel had been read, on the occasion of the elevation of Joannes Diaconus to the episcopate (Wal. Strabo, Vit. S. Galli, i. 25; see Audoenus, Vit. S. Eligii, ii. 22). In St. Chrysostom's time the sermon was prefaced, in common with other distinct portions of the liturgy, with the versicle and response, "The Lord be with you," R. "And with thy spirit," and was closed with a doxology to the Holy Trinity (Ep. ad Col. Hom. iii. p. 348). Further information on this and similar points is given under PREACHING, p. 1684, and HOMILY, p. 781. [F. E. W.]

SERPENT. (See DRAGON and DEVIL.) There is this distinction between representations of the serpent and the dragon in Christian symbolism: that the former represents the evil power in its tempting office, as inviting to sin (Bottari, ii. 60, &c.), and the latter generally points to evil or the evil one in his destructive function, as the permitted agent of punishment. A gem given by Gori (Thes. Diptych. vol. iii. p. 160) represents the serpent twined about the cross and apparently tempting two doves [CROSS, p. 495]. Whether the serpent on the cross may not in this instance have reference to the brazen serpent (Numb. xxi. 9; John iii. 14) seems doubtful.

The early church simply followed Holy Scripture in its use of the serpentine symbol. Primarily it meant the power of evil; secondarily, it referred to the brazen serpent, as a type of the sacrifice of our Lord for man. In the first or direct form of symbolism, its use will date from the time of Constantine. He caused himself to be represented (see Eusebius, in Vit. Constantin. iii. 3) as piercing the dragon or serpent with the Labarum; and the same idea is repeated on one of his medals (woodcut No. 1), and afterwards on Constantius's (Aringhi, ii. p. 705; see Baronius, ad ann. 325; Gretzer, de Cruce, t. iii. l. i. c. 5). The ancient dragon form on the vexillum was continued by Constantine, with the monogram placed above it [DRACONARIUS, p. 579].

No. 1. Serpent and Labarum (from Martigny, p. 611).

Continual use is made of the serpentine or lacertine form in Irish and Anglo-Saxon ornament from the earliest date (see Westwood's Palaeographia Sacra, on the book of Kells and other ancient MSS.). This is of course in great part a result of the northern taste for plaited and interlaced ornament; and the forms to which snake heads are attached are generally mere ribands. Still Professor Westwood appears inclined to connect their continual recurrence with a symbolism of temptation, of the fall of man, and his 'spiritual enemies'; perhaps, behind this, to fainter traditions of ancient Ophidian worship of the principle of evil or destruction.

The earliest representation of this kind in Christian Art is the great book-cover of the Vatican, representing the youthful Christ treading on the lion and adder (figured by Gori, Thes. Dipt. vol. iii. p. 32, tab. iv.; Westwood, Fictile Ivories, pp. 51, 55).

The appended woodcut of St. Michael trampling on the serpent or dragon, in his character alike of tempter of man and enemy of God, is certainly well within our period, and of some beauty and importance, as illustrating a transition (perhaps by the hands of some skilled northern workman) from classic Roman to high Gothic art. Some of the perpendicularity of the harsher Byzantine is there, but, on the whole, the older classic style has not yielded to it. The drapery is too complicated, and, with the oval ceitra, may remind us of Saxon work; nevertheless the figure is worthy of the best Gothic of later times, which it strongly resembles.

No. 2. St. Michael and Serpent (from Gori's Thesaurus Dyptichorum).

The various Ophite or Basilidean-Christian heretics made much use of the serpent on amulets, &c. (see GEMS, p. 721, Nos. 3, 4), and it appears from Augustine (de Haeres. cap. xvii. and xli.) that the Manicheans used it as a direct type of our Lord. See King (Antique Gems and Kings, vol. ii. p. 20, note), where the dove, with an olive-leaf and perched on a wheat-sheaf, represents the church, and is supported by a lion and a serpent, evidently with reference to Matt. x. 16.

Our Lord's reference to the serpent of the wilderness as a type of Himself would give the early church the same natural reason for using it as a graphic symbol, as for the use of the Good Shepherd. Nevertheless, it seldom occurs, although it is the first "image" which occurs to Tertullian as permissible in his protest against all such things in De Idololatriâ, iii. St. Ambrose dwells on it thus (De Spiritu Sancto, lib. iii. c. 9): "Imago enim crucis aereus serpens est: qui proprius (De Salomon. cap. xii. et Serm. lv. De Cruce Christi) erat typus corporis Christi: ut quicumque in eum aspiceret, non periret."

No. 3. Serpent (from Martigny, p. 612).

Martigny also gives a woodcut, which we here repeat (No. 3), from a gilt glass, without reference, which, as he says, may represent Moses with his rod, and the brazen serpent, with a person who represents the Jewish people contemplating the latter. But from the large size of the serpent, and the calm attitude of the spectator, the subject may possibly be the rod-serpent as he appeared before Pharaoh, after swallowing all the others.

There still exists in the nave of St. Ambrogio at Milan a brazen serpent on a granite column, to which a number of stories are attached. It appears from Aringhi (Roma Subterranea, vol. ii. p. 453, bk. iv. 4) that it was given to Arnulf, bishop of Milan, at Constantinople in 1101; he having gone there as ambassador from Otho III. (see Ferrari, Monum. di S. Ambrogio, p. 20). It is not likely to be any remnant of a heathen-temple of Aesculapius on the spot, and is probably an Alexandrian talisman of the 3rd or 4th century. (Murray's Handbook of Northern Italy, p. 158.) This reminds us of the singular wreathed or triple serpent-pillar still in the hippodrome of Constantinople,^a said to be the same as that partly shattered but not destroyed by Mohammed II. in 1453, at the Turkish storm of the city. The story may be an invention of Thévenot's, and the pillar is a mere wreck (see De Quincey, Miscellanies, chiefly narrative, p. 345, ed. 1854). At Milan it was long believed to have been received by Arnulf as the identical brazen serpent of the wanderings, and accordingly held miraculous, till Carlo Borromeo seems to have remembered or rediscovered that that relic had been destroyed by Hezekiah. He forbade any honours being paid it accordingly. [R. St. J. T.]

SEVILLE, COUNCILS OF (HISPALENSIA CONCILIA). There were two councils held at Seville: one under Leander, the other under his brother St. Isidore.

(1) A.D. 590, which published three canons, the two first relating to the emancipation of slaves; while the third renews the 5th canon of the 3rd council of Toledo, as having been set at nought. But several more are given to it by Burchard and others (Mansi, x. 449 sq.).

(2) A.D. 619, which published thirteen canons: of which the twelfth relates to a Monophysite bishop, a Syrian by birth, who had come among them and at length abjured his heresy: which is refuted and condemned in the thirteenth. The rest are disciplinary (Mansi, x. 555 sq.).

SEXES, SEPARATION OF. In the early church the women were always separated from the men in public worship. What the origin of the usage was, it is by no means easy to say.

The practice may probably have come into the Christian church without any formal enactment from the usages of Jewish worship, in which the women were (and are to this day) separated from the men. Or, again, it may be simply a feature of Oriental life and manners, under which females were always kept in greater seclusion than they are with us under the civilisation of the West. In the Apostolical Constitutions it becomes the subject of a special direction that the women be seated apart (κεχωρισμένως) (Apost. Constit. ii. 57, ed. Bunsen; Analecta Antenicæna, vol. ii. p. 121); and (ibid. p. 122) if any man was found sitting out of his place, he was to be smitten by the deacon, and transferred to the place appropriate for him. At one time, moreover, it appears that the sexes entered the church by different doors (Apost. Constit. lib. ii. c. 61). The ostiarii were to stand at the entrances of the men and the deaconesses at those of the women (see Mede's Discourse of Churches, p. 327, fol. ed.). St. Chrysostom seems to speak of an actual partition between the men and the women. "There ought to have been within you [the men] a wall which parted you from the women; but since ye would not, the fathers thought it necessary to wall you off even with these boards: for I hear from my elders that anciently there were not these walls" (St. Chrys. Hom. 73 in S. Matt.).

In some places it would seem that the part of the church allotted to the women was, in some sense, upstairs. They were placed probably in some kind of a gallery (ὑπερφῶν) [GALLERIES, p. 706]. It is said by Magri (Hierolexicon, s. v. Narthex) that in non-monastic churches women were placed in the narthex, which was fenced off by grilles and rails.

The authorities for the strict maintenance of this usage of separating the sexes in the early centuries of the church are very numerous. St. Cyril of Jerusalem compares the church to Noah's Ark, "in which were Noah and his sons and his wife and their wives; and though the Ark was one, and the door was shut, yet had all things been arranged suitably. And though the church be shut, and all of you within it, yet let there be a distinction of men with men and women with women." (Catech. Prefat. Oxf. transl. p. 7.) There are several canons which expressly forbid women to enter the sanctuary of the church. We may cite as a specimen the 44th canon of the council of Laodicea—"that no woman enter into the apartment where the altar stands." The rubric of a pontifical of the church of Poitiers (executed in MS. not later than the 10th century) directs that the males be arranged in dexteram partem, and the females in sinistram (Martene, de Eccl. Ritibus, lib. i. cap. i. art. 12). [H. T. A.]

SHAVING. [BEARDS; HAIR; ORDERS, HOLY, p. 1491; TONSURE.]

SHEEP. [LAMB; SHEPHERD, THE GOOD.]

SHELLS. Both marine and fresh water shells, either whole or broken, are often found on the tombs of martyrs and other Christians (Boldetti, Osservazioni, p. 512, fig. 65). They are sometimes found fixed to the outside of the loculi; sometimes merely drawn or engraved upon them (ib. pp. 351, 435); often in the form of a buccinum or whelk. Various forms of this symbol may be observed on a curious sarcophagus in the Vatican, representing different kinds of fishing (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, tav. xlii.). Gems are found engraved with this device, and sepulchral lamps, either in the form of shells, or having shells carved upon them (Bartoli, Antiq. Lucern. part iii. fig. 23). Ancient Gallic tombs exhibit precisely analogous features. Snail-shells were found in the sarcophagus of St. Eutropius discovered in 1843, and M. Letronne (Recueil de Pièces, &c. p. 81) shews that the use of them in Gaul cannot have been a matter of chance. Instances of the same symbolism have been met with in a Merovingian tomb in the cemetery of Vicq, and the abbé Cochet, in the course of his excavations, met with a good many, especially in a tomb of the time of Charlemagne, near Dieppe (Normandie souterraine, passim).

The most probable explanation of this custom is that the shell was used as a type of the Resurrection. The shell represents the tomb, which the occupant must leave empty on the last day. One sarcophagus, at Marseilles, shews the shell with the snail still in it (Millin, Midi de la France, pl. lviii. 4).

The significance attached to this symbol in the Middle Ages is shewn by a miniature of the 13th century, given by Count Aug. de Bastard (Bullet. des Comit. Hist. Archéol. &c. 1850, p. 173), representing a snail coming out of its shell by the side of a drawing of the resurrection of Lazarus; and the same combination may be seen in a MS. of the 15th century in a collection of ancient liturgical MSS. made by order of Louis XIV. The aptness of the symbolism is increased by the fact that the snail is said at the approach of winter to block up the mouth of his shell with a calcareous substance, which he bursts through on the return of spring (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. 'Coquillages'). [E. C. H.]

quently in the Old Testament, and is common to all countries in which the pastoral life has ever prevailed. The Homeric epithet, "Shepherd of People," conveys much the same idea as Ps. xxii. lxxx. though with far less force and tenderness. (See Ezek. xxxiv.; Jer. xxxiii. 12, &c.) Our Lord's own use of the similitude concerning Himself, and His personal relation to all mankind (Luke xv.; John x.), gave it precedence of all others, excepting perhaps that of the vine, which stands on exactly the same ground. That of Jonah, which relates rather to the Lord's resurrection than to His relation to His human family, occurs more frequently in bas-relief, and almost as often in painting. But as is observed under FRESCO, the Good Shepherd is most frequently the central painting of a roof or wall; and perhaps the earliest type of the complete decoration of a Christian vaulting is the vine, with more or less conventionalised branches and clusters surrounding the Form, bearing on His shoulders the sheep which was lost. (See VINE; Bottari, ii. tav. 93.) Before going farther, we may notice that there are three types of the Good Shepherd: one connected with the analogical image of Orpheus, and frequently used in half-vaults and semicircular spaces; another certainly adopted from the Hermes Criophorus of Calamis, at Tanagra, and representing the Shepherd with His charge found and rescued. This is universal; occurring in fresco and on sarcophagi, on the gilt-glass cups; on lamps, in ivory, and more rarely in mosaic. The third, with staff and dog, is less frequent.

For reasons which can hardly be assigned with certainty, the Good Shepherd died away in the 5th, perhaps the 4th century. Constantine, it is true, placed "symbols of the Good Shepherd" in public places in Constantinople; but as Lord Lindsay says (vol. i. ch. on Roman Art), the Eastern church gave the subject up. And though it was unquestionably an image of Hellenic origin, technically speaking, it was never adopted by the Eastern or Byzantine side of the Christian church.

The paintings in the tomb of St. Domitilla are almost certainly the earliest Christian frescoes,^a and the Good Shepherd was as certainly chief among them. There is one in the catacomb of St. Prætextatus [FRESCO], and the Callixtine contains, or did contain, many very ancient ones. The derivation of the form bearing the sheep will be found in Raoul Rochette, Discours sur l'Origine des Types imitatifs qui constituent l'Art du Christianisme; also in Seemann's Götter u. Heroen, p. 80, where the statue by Calamis is figured in a woodcut, which we here repeat. See also Pausanias, lib. ix. cap. 22, p. 752, ed. Kuhnii. This may be compared with the two 4th century statues of the Vatican and Lateran Museums, for one of which see Martigny, p. 515. Both are among Mr. Parker's Photographs, Nos. 2901, 2903. For the repetition of this type in fresco, see also No. 2928, and Aringhi, i. p. 531, 2. For the stuccoes of the Latin Way, Aringhi, ii. 28. For the three-fold Shepherd and vine, 3rd century, on a sarcophagus of the Lateran, see Parker, No. 2917, also 2938.

The chief example in mosaic is the Shepherd of Galla Placidia's Chapel. This is figured in probably during the fervour for burial with the martyrs, which prevailed about the time of Damasus. There is a shepherd with syrinx (Aringhi, i. 577), with a dog at his feet, and bearing the sheep, on a slab, at p. 594. See also Parker, No. 2052, in Lateran Museum, taken from St. Callixtus. These two last give traces of a third or Roman ideal of the Shepherd leaning on his staff, but there can be but little doubt of their meaning (see also Buonarroti, Vetri, iv. 1).

This subject occurs in the S. of France (Millin, Midi de la Gaule, pl. 65); in Africa (Annales archéologiques, am. vi. p. 196); also in a Cyrenaean hypogee (Pacho, Voyage de la Cyrénaique, pl. li. p. 376).

D'Agincourt refers three examples of vaultings painted with the shepherd in their centres to the 2nd century, given at Peinture, v. pl. vi. text ii. p. 20. One is the Orpheus under FRESKO, p. 696; in the others the Shepherd bears the sheep. These designs are too good for any late date. See GEMS, p. 713; GLASS, p. 732; LAMPS, p. 920.

Rohault de Fleury, as usual, gives several interesting examples, some of them not figured elsewhere; as the Criophorus-Shepherd with the syrinx (pl. lxi. vol. ii. p. 47), and that with the two sheep looking up to Him; both from St. Agnes. The picture from the same place, of an orante between trees, and a man milking an ewe on one side, another bearing a sheep on the other, with muletra or milkpails, as also the pastoral scene (fig. 5, ib.), seem to be of a mingled character. He also gives a cut of the Pisan bas-relief from the Campo Santo (pl. lxii.). [R. St. J. T.]

SHEPHERDS, ADORATION OF THE. [NATIVITY.]

SHIP. The comparison between human life and its troubles and a voyage with its dangers was familiar enough to the classical mind (Hor. Carm. I. xiv. xxxiv.), and easily adopted by the Christian, especially from its near associations with the fisher-life of St. Peter and other apostles. The ship in full sail (Boldetti, p. 360), or with sails furled (ib. 366) are alike used in the cemeteries, as prosecuting the voyage of Christian life, or the having happily concluded it. (See Boldetti, pp. 360, 372-3; Perret, vol. v. pl. xxxii. xxxvi. 397 of BIVIVS RESVTVS.) The LIGHTHOUSE or pharos is sometimes added, as a sign of the accomplishment of the voyage of the soul (see Mamachi, Origin. iii. tav. xvii.; Perret, v. pl. xli. 10; and Boldetti, 372-3). And in some instances the name of the dead appears to be inscribed on the ship, as in the case of the Eusebia, whose titulus is found in Passionei's Inscrizione antiche, p. 125 (fol. Lucca, 1763). The latter example is a marble in the Kircherian Museum, where two large urns or vases are represented in the ship; which may seem rather to point to a quasi Egyptian symbolism of the voyage after death than to the Christian voyage of life. Sometimes (Perret, v. pl. liii. 6) the monogram takes the place of the pharos on the sepulchral slab.*

For the ship as representing the church of Christ, see CHURCH, p. 389. For the Cardinal Borgia's jasper with our Lord as pilot and six rowers on a side (of course implying six others on the other side) see woodcut.

Ship of the Lord and Apostles (from Borgia, De Cruce Veliteruo).

The dove, with olive-branch, in token of peace, sometimes sits on the prow of the ship, often with the words in Pace. (See the inscription GENIALIS || IN PACE, with ship and dove, Perret, v. pl. xxxii.) Sometimes (as Boldetti, p. 373) there is apparent play of words on the name of the buried person, as a ship is added to the epitaph of NAVIRA. SHOES. (1) The Lord's ὑπόδημα, the strap of which St. John Baptist declares himself unworthy to unloose (John i. 27), was probably a sandal; i.e. a leather sole fastened to the foot by straps; and He Himself bade His disciples "be shod with sandals" (Mark vi. 9), an injunction with which they no doubt complied (Acts xiii. 8). It seems from the context that the intent of the Lord's command was, that the disciples should confine themselves to the simplest—even coarsest—necessaries in their journeys. And according to Martigny (Dictionnaire, p. 786, 2nd ed.) all sculptures on sarcophagi, all mosaics and some gilt glasses do exhibit the Lord and His apostles shod with sandals; but most of the frescoes in the catacombs (e.g. Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, liv. lvii. lxxii. cxx.) and gilt glasses (Buonarroti, Vetri, viii. xv. 1, xx. 2, etc.) represent them with bare feet. A few frescoes give them complete shoes (Bottari, xix. xvi. lxxii.). Female figures in art are generally shod with complete shoes. See, for instance, in frescoes, the Virgin in the Adoration of the Magi (Bottari, xxxviii.), the sisters of Lazarus (xlx.), the woman of Samaria (xxiii.), and some of the Oranti (xxxvi. lx.). Many of the Oranti, whose attire is also in other respects different from that of every-day life [PARADISE], have bare feet (cxv. cxxiii. etc.): shoes were probably not thought necessary for those who tread the paths of bliss.

Clement of Alexandria (Pædag. II. xi. § 117) has a curious passage on the shoes of Christians. He deplores the prevalent fashion of wearing sandals embroidered with golden flowers or studded with ornamental nails and even with erotic devices. All such decorations as these he would have the Christian reject, considering that the proper use of shoes is simply to protect the feet. Women may be permitted to use white shoes, except when they are on a journey, when they should use a blacked shoe (τῷ ἀλεπτῷ). On a journey they may also use nailed soles. They should at all events use shoes of some kind, out of consideration for modesty. For men however, unless it be on the march, it is better to be unshod; or, if they cannot bear naked feet, to wear light slippers, such as gymnasts use (βλαύταις ἢ φαυκαλοῖς).

By the beginning of the sixth century it was found necessary in Gaul to prohibit the clergy from wearing shoes unbecoming their condition. Thus the council of Agde (C. Agathense, c. 20) A.D. 506, forbids clerks to wear, or to have clothes or shoes not suitable to their office; and a council at Mâcon (C. Matisc. i. c. 5) A.D. 591, also forbids the clergy to wear clothes or shoes after the fashion of the world (calceamenta sæcularia). Probably these canons were intended to prevent clerks from wearing shoes of an extravagant fashion, such as the peaked shoes of the middle ages. [C.]

(2) Monastic Shoes.—In the earliest days of monasticism monks went barefoot, in strict accordance with the austerity of their profession; like the Stoic philosophers and Hebrew prophets in whose steps they trod (Cassian, Collat. xxiv. 10; Gregor. Nazian. Oratio viii. de Pace, i. Carin. 47). Instances occur continually of this kind of ascetic self-mortification in the lives of monks and hermits* (Discalceatio; nudis pedibus incedere; nudipedalia exercere, etc.). It is related of Silvanus, bishop of Philippopolis, very early in the fifth century, that during his residence at Constantinople he walked about the crowded thoroughfares of the capital of the Roman empire in sandals of twisted hay (Socrates, H. E. vii. 37).

Some heretics strove to enforce on all Christians the obligation of going barefoot; these were condemned; but the practice was commended for those who were exceptionally devout, particularly monks and penitents (Augustin. de Haeres. 68; Hieron. Ep. xxii. 28; Theodoret, Hist. Reliq. 4; Gregor. Turon. de Vit. Patr. 15). Thus Augustine praises his friend Alypius for traveling barefoot through Italy in winter (August. Confess. ix. 6). Instances of this kind might be cited almost endlessly during the middle ages. "Barefooted" was an epithet commonly applied to the mediaeval friars, even when they had ceased to merit it literally.

The great monastic legislator of Monte Casino, with his accustomed sagacity and tolerance, left the question as to the proper covering of the feet to be settled for his monks by the abbat's discretion in each particular monastery, according to the requirements of climate and locality. As a rule Benedict prescribed "pedules et caligas" as sufficient in ordinary circumstances, wisely prohibiting all controversies about size, material, colour, shape; only recommending whatever in each instance might be cheapest and least eccentric in those parts. In the list of articles of necessity for a monk are mentioned these "pedules et caligae" (Bened. Reg. c. 55).

As to the exact meaning of these terms there is much uncertainty. Martene, in his commentary on the Rule of Benedict, enumerates almost endless varieties of interpretation, not easily to be reconciled with one another, and Ménard speaks of the words as obscure. Smaragdus, according to the former, takes "pedules" as shoes, "caligae" as socks; Hiklemarus takes the words severally as slippers and sandals; Bernardus Casinensis as shoes, whether of wool or leather, and buskins or gaiters respectively made of leather and wool; Boherius Nicolaus de Fractura as shoes and boots; Haeften as woollen socks and slippers; other commentators as slippers and half-boots, or as socks and stockings (Bened. Reg. Comment. in c. 55). In such a conflict of opinions on a point so remote from the experience of modern times it is hopeless to attempt to decide.

Nor do other monastic rules solve the difficulty. Cassian allows "caligae" at midsummer only and midwinter as a protection against excessive heat or cold (Cass. Institut. I. cc. 8, 10). Isidore of Seville allows "pedules" in winter, or during a journey; at other times "caligae" only (Isid. Reg. c. 14). So Fructuosus of Braga (Fructuos. Reg. c. 4). The anonymous Rule of "Magister" orders the "caligae" to be tipped with iron and studded with nails, "ferratae ac clavatae" (Reg. Mag. c. 81). A similar expression occurs in the writings of Gregory the Great (Gregor. M. Dialog. I. c. 4. Alteserra in his Asceticon defines "caliga" as equivalent to sandal, "calceus" to shoe or boot (Altes. Ascet. V. c. 18). Probably the meaning of all these terms varied in different times and places.

As usual, the rule and practice of the female devotees correspond with those of the monks. Egyptian nuns, for instance, are spoken of by Isidore of Pelusium, as "sandalled recluses" (Isidor. Epp. I. 87).

SIGN OF THE CROSS. The use of the sign of the cross is of great antiquity, and was very frequent in the earlier centuries of the Christian Church. It was connected with such passages of Scripture as Ezek. ix. 4, Rev. vii. 3, ix. 4, xiv. 1, or more fancifully with such passages as Ps. cxliv. 1. It was by Moses' hands being held up in the form of a cross that Joshua was believed to have conquered Amalek (Ex. vii. 9-14), and the cross was identified with the sign of the Son of Man foretold to appear hereafter in the heavens (St. Matt. xxiv. 30). (Chrysost. and Jerome, in loco; Cyril, Cat. Lect. xiii. 41, xv. 22; Cyprian, ad Quirin. sects. 21, 22; Ephrem Syrus, de Panoplia.)

II. The original mode of making the sign of the cross was with the thumb of the right hand, generally on the forehead only, or on other objects, once or thrice (Chrysost. Hom. ad pop. Antioch. xl.; "Thrice he made the sign of the cross on the chalice with his finger" (Sophron. in Prat. Spirit.). So Sozomen of Donatus (lib. vii. cap. 27); and Epiphanius of Josephus (Haer. xxx.). Justin M. Var. Quaest. 118. "The sign of the cross is on our brow and on our heart. It is on our brow that we may always confess Christ, on our heart that we may always love him, on our arm that we may always work for him" (Ambrose, Lib. de Isaac et Anima, viii.). "Be not ashamed of the cross of Christ. For this reason hast thou received it on thy forehead, as it were on the seat of shame" (Aug. in frag. Serm. 27; see Serm. 2 in Parascève; Com. in Pss. 30, 141; Cypr. de Unit. Eccles. cap. 16). The act of crossing was generally performed in the name of the Trinity, expressed or implied. "The faith is sealed in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost" (Tertull. de Bap. cap. 6), or in the name of Christ. "Being a Christian she crossed herself in the name of Christ" (Epiphani. Hæc. 30, cap. 7), or with some formula of renunciation of evil. "I renounce thee, O Satan, and thy pomp and thy service, and I enrol myself as thine, O Christ. As thou sayest this, make the sign of the cross upon thy forehead" (Chrysost. Or. 21, ad Pop. Antioch). It is impossible to fix the exact date at which this primitive method of making the sign of the cross became obsolete. In the 6th century a second and more elaborate method had already supplanted it. The hand was raised to the forehead, then drawn down to the heart, then to the left shoulder and then to the right, but in the Eastern Church first to the right and then to the left shoulder. Sometimes the thumb was laid cross-wise over the index finger and kissed (Gretser, de Cruce, bk. iv. c. 2). A third method, usual in benedictions and consecrations, was to make the sign of the cross in the air over persons or objects. A fourth method was to raise the hand to the forehead in the name of God, as the head of all, then to lower it to the mouth in the name of the Son, who is the Word of the Father, then to the heart in the name of the Spirit, who is the bond of love. In all these cases some or all of the fingers might be employed with varying symbolical significations. Five fingers would represent the five wounds of Christ; three fingers the Blessed Trinity; one finger the unity of the Godhead. Thus pope Leo IV. ordered, "Sign the chalice and the oblation with the right cross; that is to say, not in a circle and with various fingers, as many do, but with two fingers extended, and the thumb bent up underneath, by which the Trinity is signified. Study to make that sign of the cross rightly, for otherwise ye are unable to bless anything" (Suppl. Mansi Concil. tom. i. p. 911). The phrases, "Portare crucem in fronte," ἐκτιπὼν ἐν τῷ μετώπῳ, have led some persons erroneously to suppose that the cross was indelibly impressed on that part of the body; and a custom does seem actually to have existed at one time in the East of branding Christian children on the forehead in order that they might be recognised again if carried into captivity by Mahomedans (Renaudot, Perpét. de la Foi, tom. v. 1, 2, c. 4, p. 106).

III. The following passages will prove how widespread the use of the sign of the cross became from A.D. 150 onwards. They form merely a handful, selected from out of the multitude of allusions to it which occur in the pages of the chief Christian writers of the first five centuries.

"In all our travels and movements, in all our coming in and going out, in putting on our shoes, at the bath, at the table, in lighting our candles, in lying down, in sitting down, whatever employment occupieth us, we mark our foreheads with the sign of the cross" (Tertullian, de Cor. Mil. c. iii.). "We see the sign of the cross naturally in a ship borne along with belling sails; we see it when the ship glides forward with outstretched oars, and when the yard is hoisted; we see it when a pure-hearted man worships God with extended hands" (Minucius Felix, edit. 1672, p. 287, compare Justin. M. Apol. 2; Ambrose. Serm. 56; Jerome, Ep. 29, &c.). "And when ye do this, we shall lay our hands upon your heads, and make the sign of the cross upon your foreheads" (Julius Africanus, Hist. lib. vi.). "We ought, therefore, on rising to give thanks to Christ, and to perform all our daily work with the sign of the cross (Ambrose. Serm. 43). "Whatever thou doest, wherever thou goest, let thy hand make the sign of the cross" (Jerome, ad Eustoch. Ep. 22). "Let the word of God and the sign of Christ be in thy heart, in thy mouth, on thy forehead, when thou sittest at meals, when thou goest to the baths, when thou retirest to thy bed, in going out and in coming in, in time of joy and in time of sorrow" (Gaudentius Brixianus, tract. i. de Lect. Evang.; see Migne, Patr. Cursus, tom. xx. p. 890). Compare Prudentius, Cath. Hymn. vi. 129, seq.; adv. Symm. ii. 712. "For this reason the Lord himself has fixed his cross on the foreheads of those who believe on him, which is as it were the seat of shame, where proud and impious madmen mocked him in order that the faithful may not blush at his name, and may rather seek the glory of God than of men" (Augustinus, Hom. liii. in Evang. S. Joan. sect. 13; Hom. viii. sect. 2; Hom. xi. sect. 3, et passim). "A third commentator, one of those who believe in Christ, said that the rudimentary elements presented in the letter Tau a resemblance to the figure of the cross, and that therein was contained a prophecy of the sign which is made by Christians upon their foreheads; for all the faithful make the sign in commencing any undertaking, and especially at the commencement of prayer or of reading Holy Scripture" (Origen, Schoet. in Ezech. cap. 9). "Let us not then be ashamed to confess the Crucified. Be the cross our seal made with boldness by our fingers on our brow, and on everything; over the bread we eat, and the cups we drink; in our comings in and goings out; before our sleep, when we lie down, and when we awake, when we are in the way, and when we are still (St. Cyril of Jer. Catech. Lect. xiii. 36).

"That sign of the cross which formerly all persons shuddered at, is now so emulously sought by every one, that it is to be found everywhere, among rulers and subjects, among men and women, among married and unmarried, among bond and free. All are continually making it upon the noblest portion of the human frame, and daily bear it about engraved on their foreheads as on a pillar. Behold it at the holy table; at the ordination of priests; refulgent along with the body of Christ at the mystic meal. Everywhere one may see it celebrated, in houses, in market-places, in deserts, in high-roads, on mountains, in groves, on hills, on the sea, in ships, in islands, in couches, in dresses, in arms, in porches, in convivial assemblies, on gold and silver vessels, in pearls, in mural paintings, on the bodies of the suffering brute creation, on the bodies of persons possessed by devils, in war, in peace, by day, by night, in revellers' dances, in companies of ascetics. Thus do all vie with each other in seeking this marvellous gift, this unspeakable grace." (Chrysost. contra Iudaeos et Gentiles quod Christus sit Deus, edit. 1718, p. 571; Hom. lv. in S. Matth.; Hom. xxi. ad Pop. Antioch.; Hom. x. in Acta iv. 1-22, where he complains of its having dropped into a merely habitual mechanical action; Hom. in 2 Tim. ii. 26, and in 1 Cor. iv. 6, &c.)

IV. The above quotations prove that the sign of the cross accompanied almost every action, sacred or profane, in a Christian life, from rising in the morning until retiring to rest at night. It may, however, be convenient to specify some objects for which it was deemed especially useful, and some particular virtues which were believed to be contained in it, or results which were secured by its use.

(a) It was employed by members of the early Church to denote that they were Christians; and to distinguish themselves from the surrounding heathen. "We recognise the members of Christ, if they are the members of Christ, by their bearing the sign of Christ" (Augustine, Serm. 53, de Verbo Dei). The Puritans understood this, and urged the altered circumstances of the times as a ground for abandoning the custom altogether (Hooker, Eccles. Pol. lxx. 6).

(b) To put the devil to flight. It was believed to be very efficacious towards repelling the assaults and neutralising the power of evil spirits. "Then some of the assistant ministers, who knew the Lord, standing by the sacrificing priest, made the immortal sign of the cross upon their foreheads; and when it was made, the demons were put to flight, and the sacred rites thrown into confusion" (Lactantius, Lib. de Mort. Persec. edit. 1692, p. 87). "Along with these words make the sign of the cross upon thy forehead; for thus not only no human adversary, but also not even the devil himself, will be able in any way to hurt thee, seeing thee appearing everywhere protected by these arms" (Chrysost. ad Illim. Catech. ii. ad finem; Hom. lv. in S. Matth.; Adv. Iudaeos, viii. 8; Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. Lect. iv. 13, xiii. 3, 36; Augustine, Lib. de Symb. cap. i. et passim). "Let him who wishes to obtain a proof of what has been said before come, and at the appearance of demons, or in the case of the deceitfulness of oracles and of the marvels of magic, let him use the sign of the cross which is ridiculed among them, merely naming the name of Christ, and he will see how the demons are put to flight by it, and how the oracles cease, and all magic and witchcraft are brought to nought" (Athan. de Incarn. Verbi Dei, cap. 48).

(c) For reminding and encouraging themselves and others under difficulties and trials to their faith. "The flesh is signed with the cross, that the mind may be fortified" (Tertull. de Res. Carnis, c. 8.) St. Cyprian encouraged martyrs thus: "Let thy brow be fortified, that the mark of God may be preserved intact" (Epp. 56 et 58, c. 6), and congratulated those who had not lapsed in these words: "The brow purified with the sign of God could not endure the crown of Satan, but reserved itself for the crown of the Lord" (De Laps. ch. 2, tom. i. 121).

(d) As a remedy against temptation to special sins; as anger (Chrysost. in S. Matt. xxvii. 44; in Act. vii. 36-53), or lust (Ambrose, Exhort. ad Virg.).

(e) As a charm against disease or mishap, St. Chrysostom enumerates this among its chief virtues. "This sign, both in the days of our forefathers and now, hath opened doors that were shut up, hath neutralised poisonous drugs, hath taken away the power of hemlock, hath healed bites of venomous beasts." (Hom. liv. in S. Matt. xvi. 23; Hom. viii. in Col. iii. Aug. in Ps. xciii.; Sophron. in Prat. Spirit. c. 56.) Many of the fabulous stories contained in the pages of later historians and martyrologists are connected with this supposed efficacy of the sign of the cross. (Sulp. Severus, de Vita Martini, cap. iii. ix. xxiv. et al.).

(f) For purifying places, churches, vessels, cups, food, drink, and other objects which were considered unclean, or had been abused to idolatrous purposes. "Is not then swine's flesh unclean? By no means, when it is received with thanksgiving, when it is marked with the sign of the cross; no more is any other thing unclean." (Chrysost. Hom. xii. in 1 Tim. iv.; for fabulous stories of later writers vide Bede, tom. iii. in Vita S. Vedasti; Fortunatus, in Vita S. Germani, c. 34.)

V. It remains to give some account of the ceremonial use of the sign of the cross in the liturgy and sacramental offices of the primitive Church. As most of the ritual writers and most missals and manuals, at all events in their present form, are of a later date than the 9th century, this account must be necessarily of a somewhat fragmentary character. A minute and systematic account or a comparative table of its use in the Eastern and Western offices-books could only be drawn from materials of mediæval and modern times.

The Sacramentary of Leo contains no rubrical directions at all. The few rubrics enjoining the sign of the cross in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries, in the earliest ordines Romani, and in the fragments of certain Eastern and Western pontificals and rituals not later than the 9th century will be noted under different headings. Of early ritualists, Amalarius explains the meaning of crossing with oil and balsam in baptism (lib. i. c. 27), and its frequent ritual use in Holy Communion, at the gospel, at the consecration of the chalice by touching it crosswise with a particle of the consecrated host, and who suggests greater simplicity in its use: "It seems to me that if the sign of the cross was made once over the bread and wine it would be enough, because the Lord was crucified once" (lib. iii. 18, 24, 31).

There are many passages scattered up and down the pages of the Christian apologists and the early fathers which bear out what the above facts seem to imply, that the use of the sign of the cross became, at a very early date, a marked feature of Christian worship, both in their general devotions, and more especially in the administration of the sacraments. The joined or crossed hands in any prayer represented the cross—"Crucis signum est cum homo porrectis manibus Deum puramente veneratur" (Minucius Felix, edit. 1672, p. 288), 'Ενὶ εὐχῶν σταυροῦ, κ.τ.λ. (Chrysost. Demonst. quod Christus sit Deus, cap. 8). In speaking of the sacraments, language was sometimes employed which would seem to assert their invalidity, or at least their irregularity, if the sign of the cross was not a constituent portion of their ceremonial. "Whoever may be the ministers of the sacraments, of what sort soever may be the hands which either immerse the candidates (audientes) for baptism, or anoint them; by whatever lips the sacred words are uttered, it is the authoritative use of the sign of the cross which works the effect in all the sacraments" (Cyprian, de Pass. Christi). St. Augustine said that "Unless the sign of the cross is made either on the foreheads of the faithful, or on the water itself wherewith they are regenerated, or on the oil with which they are anointed with chrism, or on the sacrifice with which they are nourished, none of these things is duly performed" (Hom. cxviii. in S. Joan. xix. 24). St. Chrysostom used these words: "As a crown so let us bear about the cross of Christ. For by it all things are wrought that are done among us. If one is to be regenerated, the cross is there, or to be nourished with that mystical food, or to be ordained, or to do anything else, everywhere that symbol of victory is present with us" (Hom. liv. [d. lv.] in S. Matt. vii.; Op. tom. vii. p. 551).

In these and other passages we find that the sign of the cross was part of the ceremonial attending certain religious services, and was especially employed on the following occasions:—

(a) At the reception of a Catechumen.—St. Augustine, in an address to catechumens, told them, "Ye are not yet regenerate by holy baptism, but ye have been conceived in the womb of holy mother Church by the sign of the cross." (Lib. de Synb. ad Catech.; Hom. 1. in S. Joan. sect. 12; Hom. in 1 S. Joan. c. 2; de Peccator. Mer. c. 26, et passim). In the old Ambrosian rite the sign was ordered to be made once on the catechumen's forehead; in an old Gallican rite, twice on the forehead and breast; in an old Gothic missal four times, on the eyes, ears, nose, and heart; in a Gallican sacramentary (7th century), once on the face.

The above and the following details are culled from the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries, and the fragments of early Western missals or rituals preserved in Mabillon's Musæum Italicum, and Martene, de Antig. Ecclæs. Rit. Their statements, or conjectures, as to the dates of documents have been accepted.

(b) At Baptism.—In the preliminary consecration of the water:—"Baptism, that is to say the water of salvation, is not the water of salvation, unless having been consecrated by the name of Christ, who shed His blood for us, it is marked with the sign of the cross" (Aug. Hom. xxvii.; lib. 6, c. Juliam. cap. 8; Cypr. Ep. lviii. sect. 10); in the exorcism and imposition of hands (Aug. Conf. i. cap. 11); at the unction (Constit. Apost. lib. iii. cap. 17; Tertul. de Resur. cap. 8; Ambros. de iis qui initiuntur, c. 4, et passim).

(c) At Confirmation.—This rite, in early times, immediately following baptism, consisted of the imposition of hands and the making the sign of the cross on the candidate's forehead with chrism and in the name of the Trinity. "Baptized persons receive the gifts of grace by the sign of the same cross, and by imposition of hands." (Aug. Serm. 19, de Sanctis; Gelas. Sacram.; York Pontifical of Egbert; Cahors, Beauvais, Poitiers rituals of 9th century.)

(d) In extreme unction.—The short office for this rite in the Gregorian Sacramentary contains no rubric enjoining the sign of the cross. It does not appear in connexion with unction of the sick till early in the 9th century, when a Troyes pontifical directs the sick man's breast to be anointed thrice with cinders, while a Tours pontifical of about the same date presents this elaborate rubric (Martene, lib. i. Ordo, iii. cap. vii. art. iv.) [UNCTION.]

(e) In Holy Communion.—This rite is generally mentioned in passages previously quoted as one in the ceremonial of which the sign of the cross formed a part. The cross was symbolised by the elevated hands of the consecrating priest, who, "representing the mystery of the cross by the elevation of his hands, prays confidently on behalf of his own and the people's ignorance." (Cyprian, de Coena Dom.; Aug. Serm. clxxxi. de temp.; Ordo Rom. i. 8, 11, &c., ii. 2, 5; Gregorian Sacramentary; Mozarabic and Spanish liturgies of 9th cent. Martene, i. 382; Mabillon, Lit. Gall. p. 449.)

(f) In Ordination, whether of bishops, priests, deacons, subdeacons, readers, or other minor church officers (vide supra); but the earliest extant Western ordinals explicitly ordering the sign of the cross seem hardly to fall within the limits of this dictionary. There are directions for its frequent and elaborate use in the old Syro-Jacobite and Coptic ordinals printed in Martene, vol. ii. [ORDINATION.]

(g) In the Consecration of Churches and Altars.—"With the mark of the same cross churches are dedicated, altars are consecrated" (Aug. Hom. lxxv. de Divers.); of fonts, of patens (Gelas. and Gregor. Sacram.); in blessing and lighting the Easter candle on Easter eve (ib.); and, therefore, probably in other minor acts of dedication or consecration which have escaped specific mention. (For further details, in addition to authorities previously quoted, consult Lipsius, de Cruce, and Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. iv. pt. 1.) [CONSECRATION.]

SIMON ZELOTES, APOSTLE, FESTIVAL OF.

i. Legend.—Although this apostle is designated by two apparently distinct surnames in the New Testament, Zelotes and Cananaeus,^a these are, as is well known, identical in meaning. The latter merely represents the Hebrew, of which the former is the Greek equivalent, the reference doubtless being to the sect of the so-called Zealots. Beyond the fact of his apostleship, the New Testament tells us nothing of St. Simon; and, as in the case of so many other apostles, there is next to nothing of trustworthy tradition.

It is not our province to discuss either of the improbable theories which identify him either with Simon the Lord's brother, or Symeon who succeeded James as bishop of Jerusalem. The Greek Appendix of Sophronius to the Liber de Viris Illustribus, does indeed identify him with the latter (Jerome, vol. ii. 958), and speaks of the crucifixion which he underwent at the age of 120 years in the reign of Trajan. This, however, is too utterly unlikely to need further notice. A note in one of the Vienna MSS. of the Apostolic Constitutions states (viii. 27) that Simon was martyred in Judaea in the reign of Domitian.

The prevailing tenor, perhaps, of the traditions as to Simon's labours, associates him with the region east of Palestine. Thus, the prologue to the Mart. Hieronymi makes Simon suffer with Jude "in Susia, civitate magna apud Persidem" (Patrol. xxx. 437). In the Armenian chronicler Moses of Chorene (5th century) are given letters of Abgarus, king of Edessa, to Artasis, king of the Persians, and Nerses his son, which mention Simon, one of the chief apostles of Jesus, as labouring in Persia (ii. 29, 18; p. 140, ed. Whiston). Moses subsequently adds, "as regards Simon, the sphere of whose work was Persia, I can give no certain information, either as to what he did, or where he was martyred. Some declare that an apostle named Simon died near the Iberian Bosphorus" (ii. 31, 6, p. 143). On this last point, however, Moses declines to give any opinion, and evidently views the whole thing as quite doubtful. It will be noticed here that there is in the above passage nothing to shew which of the two Simons among the apostles is referred to, and the Whistons (not. in loc.) remark that most commentators suppose the reference is to Simon Peter. In the Apostolic History of the Pseudo-Abdias (lib. 6, in Fabricius, Codex Pseudepig. Novi Test. i. 609), the scene of Simon's martyrdom is given as Suair in Persia, and the name of the Persian king as Xerxes. The Christian poet Venantius Fortunatus (ob. A.D. 609), following the lead of Abdias, declares (Carm. viii. 6; Patrol. lxxxviii. 270)—

"Hinc Simonem et Judam lumen Persida gemellum Laeta relaxato mittit ad astra sinu."

^a The Καναίτης of some authorities is doubtless a change of spelling due to the belief that the word was derived from Canaan or Cana.

Another story says that he laboured in North Africa, Egypt, Cyrene, and Mauritania, but the evidence on which this rests is of no weight (Niceph. Call. Hist. Eccles. ii. 40; Pseudo-Dorotheus, in App. to Chronicon Paschale, ii. 138, ed. Dindorf). The latter states that after labouring in Africa, he carried the news of the gospel to the British Isles. Such also is the story told in the Menaea.

ii. Festival.—As in the case of nearly all the apostles, there seems no trace of any early commemorative festival of St. Simon. In the West, he has been generally associated with St. Jude, and commemorated on October 28; in the East they are commemorated on different days.

As regards the festival in the Western church, it is not necessary to repeat what we have already said in the article on St. Jude, and we shall accordingly merely refer the reader there. It may, however, be well again to remark that, though in some Western records St. Simon is commemorated on other days than October 28, yet in all these cases, so far as we are aware, he is associated with St. Jude.

In the Greek church, St. Simon is commemorated on May 10. The Menaeon identifies him with Nathanael (Σίμων ὁ καὶ Ναθαναὴλ ὀνομαζόμενος), although there can be little doubt that Nathanael is the personal name of Bartholomew. The entry for May 10 in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Scriptorum for May is (p. xxvii.) τῇ δεκάτῃ Σίμων σταύρωσαν Ἀπόστολον ἐχθροί.

In the calendars of the Ethiopic and Alexandrian churches published by Ludolf, there is no mention of St. Simon, but, from the entry on July 10 "Nathanael the Canaanite" (Ad Hist. Aeth. Comm. p. 421), we may assume that these churches, like the preceding, identify Simon and Nathanael.

In the Armenian church St. Simon is perhaps commemorated on September 28, on which day we find in the first of the two Armenian calendars given by Assemani (Bibl. Or. iii. 1. 645 sqq.) "Simeon, Apostle," though in the second the entry runs, "Simeon, the kinsman of Christ."

The name of Simon has not apparently been made much use of by the authors of apocryphal writings. We are not aware of the existence of any except the Acta Simonis et Judae given by the Pseudo-Abdias (supra). The Apostolic Constitutions, however (viii. 27, 28), assign to this apostle the regulations as to the consecration of bishops, benedictions, &c.

For an elaborate account of the legends in connexion with St. Simon and his cultus, reference may be made to Van Hecke in Acta Scriptorum (Oct. vol. xii. pp. 421 sqq.). [R. S.]

SIMONY. Bingham (Antiq. XVI. vi. 28) distinguishes between three degrees of simony; (i) buying and selling spiritual gifts; (ii) buying and selling spiritual preferments; (iii) usurpation of ecclesiastical functions without election or ordination. Against trafficking in spiritual gifts the laws of the early church were very severe. Thus the apostolical canons (c. 28) appointed that if bishop, priest, or deacon obtained his sacred character by means of money, both the ordained and the ordainer were to be subject to total excision from the church, παντάσιν τῆς κοινωνίας ἐκκοπτέσθω, the severest sentence which it was in the power of the church to inflict. The second canon of Chalcedon likewise excommunicated those who obtained by a price the priceless grace of holy orders. Similarly the second council of Braga, A.D. 572, c. 3, recapitulating the decision of the Fathers against bribes pronounces "Anathema danti et accipienti." And in fact denunciations against simony are frequent throughout the whole of our period after the 4th century; see 2 Conc. Aurel. cc. 3, 4, 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 19, 8 Conc. Tolet. c. 3, 11 Conc. Tolet. cc. 8, 9, Conc. in Trull. c. 22, 2 Conc. Nicaen. c. 5, Conc. Mogunt. c. 30, Conc. Remens. c. 21, Basil. Ep. lxxvi. ad Episc., Gelas. Ep. i. ad Episc. Lucan., Symmach. Decret. c. 1, and very frequently in the writings of Gregory, Epp. v. 53, 55, 57; vi. 8; ix. 49, 106; xi. 46; xii. 28; xiii. 41; Hom. in Evangel. i. iv. 4. Against simoniacal transactions the civil law upheld the discipline of the church. Thus Justin. Novell. cxxiii. 1, cxxxvii. 2, required in the consecration of bishops that both the electors and the bishop elect should take an oath on the Gospels that nothing had been given either by way of donation or promise, or through friendship, to obtain the election and the consecration. Closely allied to the chief sin of corrupt ordinations was that of withholding the sacraments unless payment was made. The various canons directed against this abuse indicate that on pretence of asking an offering the clergy were in the habit of setting a price on the spiritual gifts which they administered. At baptisms, for instance, it seems to have been customary to make a voluntary oblation. This easily led to the notion that the oblation was compulsory, and was calculated to deter the poor from the sacrament. The council of Elvira accordingly (c. 48) prohibited the practice of casting money into a bowl at baptism, for the clergy were not to make gain on the sacred gift which they had received without cost. On the same ground Gelasius (Ep. i. ad Episc. Lucan.) forbade the Italian clergy from exacting a fee for baptism or confirmation. And in the Greek church Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 40 de Bapt.) remonstrates with those who kept away from baptism, alleging that they could not afford the usual offering or the entertainment for the officiating clergyman; he tells them that the only offering demanded is that of themselves to Christ, and that their own holy life was the only entertainment expected. In the Spanish church apparently in spite of the decree of Elvira, the covetousness of the clergy still debarred the poor from baptism. In the second council of Braga, A.D. 572, there is a canon (c. 7) denouncing the compulsory demand of a pledge from those who had not wherewithal to offer voluntarily. The same council (c. 5) prohibited the exaction of a fee for the consecration service of a church. The eleventh council of Toledo A.D. 675 (c. 8) pronounced it contrary to ecclesiastical law to take money not only for promotion to holy orders, but also for baptism, confirmation, or unction; the demand of a fee for the administration of the eucharist fell under the same condemnation from Conc. in Trull. c. 23. A voluntary offering, which was of the nature of a thank-offering, from one who partook of a spiritual ordinance, was lawful and praiseworthy, but a compulsory fee was tainted with simony, inasmuch as it was setting a price on the work of the Spirit.

Trafficking in the gifts of the Holy Ghost was simony of the darkest dye; another degree of the same offence was the employment of corrupt means to obtain promotion or preferment in the church. In the first three centuries, when the emoluments of office were small and the danger of holding them great, there was not much occasion to pass laws against simoniacal promotions, for when a persecution arose, the rulers of the church were struck at first. But when a bishopric became not only a position of dignity and importance, but also a secure one, there would arise unscrupulous candidates for the office. A bishop who accepted a bribe in order to advance any dependant, "a house-steward, advocate, or bailiff" (Conc. Chalced. c. 2), to an ecclesiastical position was guilty of simony, no less than the man promoted, and was subject to deposition. Compare the oath already quoted to be taken by the electors that the bishop elect was not chosen from favour or through the influence of money (Justin. Novell. cxxxvii. 2), but because he was known to hold to the Catholic faith, and to be a man of good life and sound learning. The intrusion into sees already occupied was schismatical rather than simoniacal. But the ambition of bishops to get themselves removed to larger sees, whenever it was done for the sake of gain or by corrupt means, was of the nature of simony. "That pernicious custom ought to be utterly rooted out that it be lawful for any bishop to move from one city to another; for the reason for which he does this is plain, since we never heard of any bishop who laboured to be removed from a larger city to a smaller. Whenever it appears that avarice is his motive, it is idle to plead that he has received letters of invitation, since many are corrupted by bribes and rewards to send the letter" (Conc. Sardic. cc. 1, 2). The translation of bishops whose motives were pure was a common practice, and was under no suspicion of corruption. [G. M.]

(3) Nov. 8, with Claudius, Nicostratus, Sympronianus, and Castorius, eminent artificers and martyrs under Diocletian, commemorated at Rome on the Via Lavicana (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Wand.). [C. H.]

SINGER. [CANTOR; PSALMISTA; SCHOLA CANTORUM.]

SINGILIONES (σινγιλίω). In a letter of the emperor Gallienus (ob. A.D. 268), cited by Trebellius Pollio (Vita Claudii, c. 17), in which he recounts a number of presents he was sending to Claudius, who afterwards succeeded him as emperor, he mentions, among several other articles of dress, Singiliones Dalmatenses decem. The meaning of the word is very doubtful, from its extreme rarity. It seems only to occur again in the will of Gregory of Nazianzum, where he bequeaths to the "notarius" Elaphius, with other articles of dress, σινγιλίωνα ἓνα (Patrol. Gr. xxxvii. 393). We may at once, with the Greek spelling before us, reject Casaubon's proposal to read Cingiliones (not. in loc.). It seems best to suppose that the Greek word is but a reproduction of the Latin, and to compare it in idea with such Greek words as ἀπλοῖς, διπλοῖς (cf. the English singlet, doublet). Thus we have in Hesychius, ἀπλοῖδες, ἱμάτιον μικρὸν and ἀπλῆγῆς, σύμμετρος χλαῖνα οὐ δυναμένη διπλαθῆναι. Another view associates the word with Sigillum, and thus we should have a reference to marks worked into a dress (such as e. g. Gammadia [see the article] and the like), but this view seems much less probable than the foregoing. The epithet Dalmatenses may not improbably imply some connexion with the Dalmatic [DALMATIC]. See on the whole question Salmasius's note, Trebell. Poll. l. c.). [R. S.]

SIRENS. [PAGANISM IN ART, p. 1535.]

SIRIACUS, June 18; commemorated at Malaca in Spain with Paula (Mart. Usuard.).

[C. H.]

SIRMIMUM, COUNCILS OF (SIRMIENSIA CONCILIA). The number and character of these councils have been hotly disputed. Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 377-379) makes five; Valesius in one place (ad. Soz. iv. 15), four, but in another (ad. Soc. ii. 30) a fifth; Mansi (iii. 179-289), three, but is favourable to a fourth. The Jesuits Petavius (Diss. de Phot.) and Sirmondus (Diat. Sirm.) took opposite sides on the subject; and de Marca (Opusc. v.) intervened between them without settling it. There were three creeds likewise published at Sirmium, but it is not agreed by which councils. Taking Cave for our guide, whose statement is the least confused, we may arrange them as follows:—

(1) A.D. 349, when Photinus, bishop of that see, was condemned. "verum, reclamante plebe, sede sua jam deturbari non potuit," as Cave says. This synod was first brought to light by Petavius, and has been accepted by most.

(2) A.D. 351, when Constantius was there, treating with Vetrano (Soc. ii. 28) and Photinus, having disputed with Basilus of Ancyra and been worsted by him, was deposed; and Marcus composed the first of the three creeds in Greek, to which twenty-five anathemas are appended. Such at least is the conclusion of Petavius and Mansi. Valesius and Cave differ only from them in asserting that Marcus was not the author of this creed.

(3) A.D. 357, when Osius and Potamius both signed and lapsed. The creed signed by them was the second creed, published in Latin, but, according to Mansi, translated into Greek by the same Marcus who composed the first. It was much more heterodox than the first, however, so much so, that it is pronounced "blasphemy" by St. Hilary. Germinius, the successor of Photinus, was present at this council.

(4) A.D. 358, when a composite creed was put forth, to which pope Liberius subscribed, and on subscribing was restored to his see. (Comp. S. Hil. Fragm. vi. 6, and the notes in Migne, Patrol. x. 689.)

(5) A.D. 359, when, according to Valesius and Cave, "conscripta est fides illa, quam Marcus Arethusius composuit," with the names of the consuls prefixed to it. This was afterwards rehearsed at Rimini; but as it was probably this also to which Liberius subscribed, it must have been promulgated the year before, for he was restored that year, and if he subscribed to a different one, there must have been four, not three, creeds published here, which nobody maintains. Let us suppose, therefore, that the names of the consuls were prefixed to it at Rimini, and this council may be merged in the preceding one. [E. S. Ff.]

SISINNIIUS (1), May 29, deacon, martyr; commemorated with Martyrius reader, and Alexander doorkeeper at Anagnina or Anagnia (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Notker., Hieron.).

(2) Nov. 29, deacon; commemorated at Rome on the Via Salaria with Saturninus martyr, and Sennes deacon (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Adon.).

(3) Nov. 24, bishop of Cyzicus, martyr under Diocletian (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

SISOES THE GREAT, July 6, monk of the 4th century, "our father" (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet). [C. H.]

SIXTUS (1) (XYSTUS), Apr. 6, pope; commemorated at Rome (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Adon., Notker., Wand.); Apr. 3 (Flor.); Aug. 6 (Bed. Metr.), in the cemetery of Calixtus on the Via Appia (Mart. Hieron.). In the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries his natal is on Aug. 6; in the former his name occurs in the collect. secreta, and post-communion; in the latter he is mentioned in the collect. The Liber Antiph. of Gregory has an office for his natal.

(2) Sept. 1, bishop of Reims (Mart. Usuard., Wand.). [C. H.]

SLAVERY. The subject of the relation of the Church to slavery may conveniently be considered under the following divisions:—

- (i) During the first three centuries, when Christianity was itself subject to oppression and whatever amelioration is to be discerned in the condition of the slave is to be traced rather (α) to the teaching of the Stoics, (β) to the state legislation, (γ) to the secret societies, &c.
- (ii) From the commencement of Christian legislation under Constantine (A.D. 313), to the accession of Justinian (A.D. 525).
- (iii) From the accession of Justinian to the death of Gregory the Great.
- (iv) From the death of Gregory the Great to the commencement of the ninth century: (α) in the Eastern empire, (β) in Latin Christendom, (γ) among Teutonic nations, prior to the introduction of Latin institutions.

(i) During the first three Centuries.—The more general conditions of pagan life, which fostered the continuance and systematization of such an institution in the midst of highly civilized communities, are described under SOCIETY; it will be sufficient here to note a few of the principal facts which illustrate the indifference of society, as it existed at the commencement of the Christian era, to the moral wrong and physical suffering involved. Looking upon the slave as nothing more than an animal of superior intelligence, the statesman and the legislator had, up to this period, altogether discouraged the notion that he possessed any rights, or was entitled to any consideration, beyond what the interest of the master might dictate. Even Aristotle had asserted slavery to be an institution of divine origin, whereby inferior races were designedly subjected to the superior* (Politics, iii. 4), a view adopted by Cicero (de Repub. bk. iii., quoted by Nonius). Pliny compares the relation of slaves to the state to that of drones in the hive (Nat. Hist. XI. xi. 1). Cato advised that, like beasts of burden, they should be worked to death rather than be allowed to become old and unprofitable; and in order to divert them from forming conspiracies, he advised masters to incite them to quarrel with each other (Plutarch, Cato, c. 21). It was a proverbial saying that every slave was an enemy—"Quot servi, tot hostes" (Festus, ed. Mueller, p. 261). Columella (de Re Rust. i. 8) observes that the more intelligent they are the more frequently it becomes necessary to put them in chains. In the year A.D. 63, four hundred of the slaves of Pedanius Secundus, notwithstanding a strong display of popular feeling in their favour, were put to death in order to avenge his assassination by one of their number (Tac. Ann. xiv. 45); and in the time of Ulpian, who wrote in the 3rd century, this cruel practice was still authorised by law (Digest. XXIX. v. 1, §§ 32 and 39). The chief representative of the artisan class, the slave, inherited the contempt with which mechanical labour was regarded by antiquity. Plato (Repub. bk. iv.) affirms that it is of small matter whether the mechanic lives a virtuous or an immoral life; and slaves under the empire were unable to obtain redress for the violation of their own wives (Cod. Just. IX. ix. 23; Kriegel, Corp. Juris Civ. ii. 587). As he was held to be a non-religious intelligence, or of a faith differing from that of his master, he was supposed to be incapable of being bound by oath, and controllable only by fear—"quibus diversi ritus, externa sacra aut nulla sunt, colluvium istam non nisi metu coercueris" (Tac. Ann. xiv. 44). Even when on the eve of receiving his freedom, it was customary to bind him by a promise, subject to certain penalties, that on becoming a freedman he would ratify his promise by an oath (Digest. XI. xii. 44).

The severity with which the whole class was generally treated appears to have been owing rather to an instinct of self-preservation than to wanton cruelty. From the time of the Servile Wars of the 2nd century, the Roman, though master of the world, lived in constant dread of conspiracy and insurrection among those whom he had thus deprived of their natural rights, and the slaves of southern Italy were looked upon as ever ready allies for those who might seek to kindle the flames of civil war (Tac. Ann. xii. 65). The proportion of the slave class to the rest of the community under the empire has been variously estimated—by Gibbon (ed. Smith, ii. 179) as high as one-half the entire population. This estimate is generally regarded as excessive, but the extent to which the system of slavery was intertwined with the whole social fabric can hardly be exaggerated. Labour, whether on the farm, in trade, or in domestic service, was abandoned almost entirely to the slave, and was itself consequently without honour. The shepherds of Calabria and Sicily were all slaves, and frequently endeavoured to assert their freedom by a life of brigandage. By the same class the mines were worked, the merchant ship and the trireme manned, the aqueducts, roads, and viaducts made and repaired. In fact, in every department of arduous toil or productive labour (the military profession alone excepted), the burden was mainly borne by the slave. In the higher departments of mechanical skill and artistic accomplishments, the slave was the chief element, and in the mansions of the wealthy, by his varied labour, often supplied the whole wants of the household. He designed the palace, executed its decorations, and adorned its walls with paintings; he prepared the feast and enlivened it with music; he was the family physician and surgeon. The attendants on public functionaries, on the magistrate or the priest, were either slaves or freedmen (Varro, ap. A. Gellius, xiii. 13). The whole wealth of a citizen was shrewdly estimated by the answer that could be given to the question, "Quot pascit servos?"—an answer that might often be stated in thousands. Pliny (Nat. Hist. xxxiii. 47) tells us that one C. Caecilius Isidorus, in the reign of Augustus, was the owner at his death of upwards of 4000 slaves, although a large portion of his patrimony had been lost in the civil wars; and Chrysostom, in the 4th century, when condemning the inordinate luxury of his time, implies that it was no unusual thing for the wealthy owner to possess from a thousand to two thousand—ἀνδραποδῶν χιλίων, ἢ δις τοσούτων (in Matt. Hom. lxiii. 4; Migne, Series Graeca, lviii. 608).

* See on this point Krug de Aristotele Servitutis defensione, 1815. Overbeck, however, quotes Pol. I. ii. 3 (νόμος γὰρ τὸν μὲν δούλον εἶναι τὸν δ' ἐλευθερον, φύσει δ' οὐδὲν διαφέρει. διόπερ οὐδὲ δίκαιον, βίαιον γάρ), as proof that Aristotle recognised the radical injustice of the institution. Milman (Lat. Christianity, ii. 13, ed. 1867) appears to have overlooked this passage.

A consideration of these broad facts at once suggests the risk and danger that would have attended any attempt on the part of the Christian teacher in the first three centuries to denounce and overthrow slavery as a system. Such an attempt would at once, and not without reason, have been interpreted as tantamount to advocating a revolution in the state; and the charge of being revolutionary in character, as regarded pagan institutions, was one which Christianity already found it difficult to repel. It accordingly sought to ignore rather than to obliterate the class distinctions of ordinary society, and, in this policy, it could undoubtedly claim the sanction of the highest source of spiritual instruction. The convert to its principles, if a master, found in the apostolic writings only injunctions to consider his conduct towards his slave as subject to the rules of Christian intercourse. He was forbidden "to threaten" him (Ephes. vi. 9); he was to give him what was "just and equal" (Coloss. iv. 1). If a slave, he was enjoined not to allow his condition "to be a care" to him (1 Cor. vii. 21), a passage which Chrysostom interprets as an injunction to remain contented with a slave's condition—τουτέστι, τῇ δουλείᾳ παράμενε (Migne, Series Graeca, lxi. 704); he was to be obedient to his master, and to serve him "with singleness of heart and good will" (Ephes. vi. 5-9), "fearing God" (Coloss. iii. 22); whatever his master's moral character, he was to serve him "with all fear" (1 Pet. ii. 18);^b of the unlawfulness of such relations the New Testament contains no intimation, and St. Paul himself, when at Rome, was the owner of a slave (Philemon, 10-17).

The language of the early Fathers was mainly of the same tenor. They inculcated humanity on the part of the master by arguments which much resemble those with which the modern philanthropist urges the exercise of the same virtue towards the brute creation. On the slave himself they enjoined humility and resignation; but while the pagan philosopher recommended suicide to the most miserable of this unfortunate race (Seneca, Consol. ad Marc. c. 20), the Christian teacher pointed to the perfect freedom and happiness of a future state. Ignatius warns the slave not to be arrogant on account of his spiritual equality with his master, but to serve him with greater zeal; he advises the whole class not to seek enfranchisement at the expense of the community, lest they should themselves become the slaves of desire (δουλοῖ ἐπιθυμίας); he enjoins Polycarp not to despise slaves, whether male or female (Epist. ad Polycarp. c. 4; Cureton, Corp. Ignat. p. 7). Tatian appears to regard the tribute paid by the subject, and the service rendered by the slave, as coming under much the same category (adv. Graecos, c. 4; Migne, Series Graeca, vi. 246). Tertullian inculcates the exercise of patience, both on the part of the master and on that of the slave, as the most efficacious means of establishing satisfactory relations (de Patientiā, c. 15). Clement of Alexandria, in whom the allusions to slavery are frequent, urges that "slaves are men like ourselves" (Paed. iii. 12; Migne, S. G. viii. 672), and that Christians are bound to act towards them as they would themselves be acted by, but nowhere condemns the institution itself. He urges, indeed, that the unduly large numbers about a household, the ὄχλος οἰκετῶν maintained by the wealthy, should be reduced, as constituting an unjustifiable luxury (ibid. iii. 7; Migne, viii. 610); and he holds that the moral condition and education of his slaves are a matter to which no master can rightly be indifferent. He even appears to place respect to parents and regard for one's slaves on an equal footing as social obligations. Origen (Cont. Cels. iii. 44, 54) tells us that it was made a reproach to Christians by their enemies that they addressed their appeals to women, children, the uneducated, and to slaves. He implies that Christian slaves often proved instrumental in bringing about the conversion of households to which they belonged (Migne, S. G. xi. 476, 483). Callistus, bishop of Rome (A.D. 218-223), had been a slave, and it is deserving of note that Hippolytus in the Philosophumena, while bitterly assailing his character and motives, does not refer to the fact as involving any stigma.^c Of the uniform disregard in the church itself of any distinction between the slave and the free man, the catacombs afford silent but significant evidence; for "while it is impossible," says De Rossi, "to examine the pagan sepulchral inscriptions of the same period without finding mention of a slave or a freedman, I have not met with one well-ascertained instance among the inscriptions of the Christian tombs" (Boll. di Arch. Crist. 1866, p. 24; see also Le Blant, Inscrip. chrét. de la Gaule, i. 119).

In the meantime other influences were in operation, which, although there is sufficient reason for concluding that they could never have brought about the abolition of slavery, undoubtedly led to the amelioration of the condition of the slave, and to a more humane view of his position in relation to the body politic. These were (a) the doctrines of the Stoic philosophy; (B) the imperial legislation; (γ) the private clubs or societies.

That the humaner tendencies in the imperial legislation were owing to the spread of Christian doctrine, has been maintained both by the jurist and the historian, but is not supported by the most authoritative and recent research. M. Wallon (Hist. de l'Esclavage, iii. 91) distinctly admits that they are mainly to be referred to the teaching of the philosophy of the age. "When we add to these laws," says another writer, "the broad maxims of equity, asserting the essential equality of the human race, which the jurists had borrowed from the Stoics, and which supplied the principles to guide the judges in their decisions, it must be admitted that the slave-code of imperial Rome compares not unfavourably with those of some Christian nations" (Lecky, Hist. of Morals, ii. 327). "As regards certain improvements said to have been introduced by Christianity into the imperial law of slavery," says Sir Henry Maine, "they were probably quickened by its influence, but they began in principles which were of stoical rather than of Christian influence" (Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 63). The language of the Christian apologists above cited, in unison with that of the most enlightened stoicism, but scarcely transcending it, must be regarded as corroborative of these views. The stories told in Bollandus (i. Mai, p. 371; Januarii, p. 275), on the other hand, of eminent Romans in the reigns of Trajan and Diocletian, immediately after their baptism liberating large numbers of their slaves, are at variance with nearly all the evidence for this period.

(ii) From the commencement of Christian legislation under Constantine (A.D. 313) to the accession of Justinian (A.D. 525).—The period upon which we are now entering presents us with evidence of a desire on the part of the legislator not only to ameliorate the condition but to facilitate the liberation of the slave, while, in either case, the laws relating to the subject clearly bear the impress of a more humane spirit. For example, within two years from the time that Christianity received state-recognition, a law passed in A.D. 315 enjoins that fugitive slaves shall be branded only on their hands or their ears, and not on the face—"quo facies, quae ad similitudinem pulchritudinis est coelestis figurata, minime maculetur" (Cod. Just. IX. xvii. 17; Kriegel, Corpus Jur. Civ. ii. 271)—a sentiment manifestly of Christian origin.

The laws relating to manumission afford more decisive evidence. The customary form of manumission during the master's lifetime had hitherto been by a well-known ceremony performed in the presence of the praefect and his lictor; but, by a decree of the year 316, it was declared that a slave might be set at liberty by a simple declaration made in a Christian church in the presence of the priest and the congregation, while, instead of the ancient ceremony, a written document signed by the master was to suffice as evidence (ibid. I. xiii. 1; Kriegel, ii. 89-90).

In the year 321, a further concession was made in a decree of Constantine addressed to Hosius, the eminent bishop of Cordova, and not improbably reflecting his personal influence over that monarch (see Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iii. c. 4). Here, after recapitulating the above law, the enactment goes on to declare that the clergy are permitted to bestow complete civil rights on their slaves, not only by a simple declaration of their purpose before "the church and godly folk," but also by instructions in their wills or any formal document, the freedom thus conferred to acquire validity from the day on which their intent has been made known (Cod. Just. I. xiii. 2).

Biot (de l'Abolition de l'Esclav. p. 147) interprets this latter law as proof of a design on the part of Constantine to attract converts to Christianity, inasmuch as those whose enfranchisement was proclaimed in a Christian church would necessarily be Christians, and these are here admitted to "plenum fructum libertatis," i.e. to rank not simply as "Latini" but as "cives." It was not until the year 401, nearly a century later, that this mode of enfranchisement was extended to Africa (Biot, p. 148); but, wherever valid, it appears to have been recognised as a triumph of Christianity. Augustine, in one of his sermons (Serm. cccvi. sec. 3), announces that several of his clergy are designing to emancipate the few slaves they possess,—the result apparently of the introduction of the new law into his diocese. Gregory of Nyssa, in contrasting the features which distinguished the Christian celebration of Easter from pagan festivals, mentions, among others, "the slave enfranchised by the good and humane proclamation of the church, and not smitten in unseemly fashion on the cheek" (de Resur. Dom. Orat. 3; Migne, S. G. xlv. 657).

A law bearing on the same subject, but of yet earlier date than either of the foregoing, is lost; but we learn from Sozomen (H. E. i. 9) that a hundred years later these three laws were placed at the head of all formal documents of enfranchisement—προγράφεσθαι ἐν τοῖς γραμματέϊσι τῶν ἐλευθερίων (Migne, S. G. lxxvii. 21); and it is easy to recognise in the class enfranchised by the law of 316 the "tabularii," and in that of 321 the "chartularii" of barbaric codes of a later period (see infra, Pt. iv.).

^c The sanction extended by Callistus to marriages solemnised in his diocese between free Christian women and Christian slaves, is noted by Overbeck (Studien, &c. p. 190), as one of the very rare instances that present themselves before the time of Constantine of any attempt on the part of the church to determine questions that came within the provisions of state legislation (see Hippolyti Refut. ix. 12).

If we add to the foregoing laws another of the year 334, forbidding the arbitrary separation of the father of a family from his wife and children upon the death of their common owner (Digest. XXXIII. vii. 12, § 7; Kriegel, i. 553); and another, passed under Zeno in the year 486, forbidding any citizen in any province of the empire to have a private prison (Cod. Just. IX. v.), we have before us the main evidence that presents itself, prior to the time of Justinian, of a desire on the part of the legislator to render the yoke of slavery less intolerable.

On the other hand, it is not to be disguised that the actual condition of the slave remained much the same. We find, for example, from a law of the year 317, that the examination of fugitive slaves was still carried on by torture (Cod. Just. VI. i. 4). A law of the year 319 declares that on a slave who has been subjected to the lash, or put in chains, dying, as the subsequent result, his master is not to be brought to trial, the latter being liable to the charge of homicide only when death has been the immediate result of his violence (Cod. Theod. IX. xiii. 1, ed. Haenel, p. 859). Another law of the year 332 enacts that freedmen may again be reduced to slavery if they have exhibited "superbiam," or have injured their patron (b. IV. x. 1; Haenel, p. 396). Another, of the year 376, directs that slaves turning informers against their masters are to be burnt, along with whatever documentary evidence they may have put in, the sole exception being where the accusation which they have alleged has been that of treason against the state—"majestatis" (ibid. IX. vi. 2; Haenel, pp. 836-837).

It is undeniable that in the 4th century the language of the Fathers assumes a bolder tone. Chrysostom (ad Ephes. Hom. xxii. 2), Gregory Nazianzen (Poem. Theol. ii. 26), Lactantius (Div. Inst. v. 15) alike inquire into the origin of the institution, and concur in tracing it to evil principles, to avarice, tyranny, and injustice; it is openly stigmatised as a reversal of natural law (Ambrosius, adv. Gentes, bk. ii.). Lactantius expressly states that Christianity recognises no difference between rich and poor, bond and free (Div. Inst. v. 16). Chrysostom boldly grapples with the apparent difficulty presented by St. Paul's non-condemnation of the system,^a and gives it as his explanation that the exhibition of a state of slavery, in conjunction with that of spiritual liberty, was a greater moral triumph for Christianity than its abolition, even, he says, as the spectacle of the three Hebrew youths walking in the furnace was a greater marvel than the extinction of the flames would have been (in Genesim, serm. v. 1). The manner, again, in which the church asserted the slave's religious equality with the free man cannot but have paved the way for the recognition of his civil and social equality. While paganism had looked upon him as a non-religious member of the state, the church admitted him to the rite of baptism; and Gregory Nazianzen insists, with emphasis, on the absolute equality of all admitted to this sacrament: "Think not, ye rich, that it is beneath your dignity to be baptized with the poor, or, ye masters, with your slaves. For even in so doing ye humble not yourselves as did Christ, in whom ye are this day baptized, and who, for your sakes, took upon Him the form of a slave. For, from the day that ye are changed anew, all the ancient marks disappear; Christ is impressed as a common form on all" (Orat. in Sanct. Bapt., Migne, S. G. xxxvi. 712). In like manner, Chrysostom (in Sanct. Pascha, Hom. iii. 4) maintains the theory of a perfect equality among the partakers of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. According to the 73rd of the Apostolical Canons, no slave was to be admitted to ordination without his master's sanction; for this, the canon says, would be the subversion of a household; his master's consent and his own freedom are declared to be essential. It would appear, however, that in Jerome's time slaves were sometimes ordained without having obtained enfranchisement. John, bishop of Jerusalem, having complained of such an ordination in the church at Rome, Jerome, writing to Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, retorts that John himself has some among his clergy of the same condition, and urges that Onesimus, whom Paul converted while in prison, was ordained a deacon while still a slave (Epist. 82; Migne, xxii. 516). In the correspondence of Gregory Nazianzen, we find him referring to a case where a slave had been made bishop over a small community in the desert. The Christian lady to whom he belonged endeavoured to assert her right of ownership, for which she was severely rebuked by St. Basil. After St. Basil's death she again claimed the slave, whereupon Gregory addressed to her a letter of grave remonstrance at her un-Christian desire to recall his brother bishop (συμολιπν) from his sphere of duty (Epist. 79; Migne, S. G. xxxvii. 149-154). It is, however, to be noted that Gregory himself, "though he had liberated some of his slaves in his lifetime, yet did not set others free till his death" (Babington, Influence of Christianity, &c., p. 29).

In the 5th century, and subsequently to that period, both the priestly office and the monastic profession were largely recruited from the servile class; but while the church compassionately connived at this means of escape from slavery, the exigencies of the state (as will shortly be shewn) appear to have been held incompatible with such licence. Leo the Great, indeed, in his lofty conception of the sacerdotal office, denounced a practice whereby he affirms "the-sacred ministry is dishonoured, and the rights of masters are set at naught" (Epist. 4; Migne, liv. 612). A decree of the first council of Orleans (A.D. 511) requires that whenever a bishop shall have admitted a slave to the office of deacon or presbyter unknown to his owner, the ransom paid shall be double the slave's value (Sirmond, i. 180). A council held in the same city, in 538, decrees that the bishop who has thus infringed upon the master's rights shall himself be suspended for a year from the function of celebrating mass (ib. i. 255); it further requires that neither "coloni" (see infra, sec. iii.) nor slaves "shall be admitted to ecclesiastical honours until either by testament or charter they have been made free,"—"Ut nullus servilibus coloniarisque conditionibus obligatus, juxta statuta sedis Apostolicæ, ad honores ecclesiasticos admittatur; nisi prius aut testamento aut per tabulas legitime constiterit absolutum" (ib.). The prevailing tone with respect to slavery is still such as indicates that, like poverty and other ills, it was regarded rather as a misfortune to be endured than an injustice to be done away with,—a form of suffering, consequent upon the Fall, of which the chief compensation was to be looked for in a future life (Eusebius, Theophan. v. 21; Gregory of Nyssa, Orat. 9; Chrysostom, Hom. 29, in Gen.; Cyril of Alexandria, de Adorand. in Spiritu et in Verit. bk. viii.). The fear that Christianity might appear to be aiming at revolutionising the state still operated with considerable force. Chrysostom says that "it is fitting that the Gentiles should perceive that a slave may please God; otherwise they will assuredly blaspheme and say that, if masters are to be deprived of their slaves, Christianity has been brought in to upset the existing order of things, and is a work of violence." In the same treatise he says that if a slave is distinguished by his excellent qualities, this is all the more reason that he should continue in servitude, so that by his presence he may exert a beneficial influence over the whole household (Arg. in Epist. ad Philem., Migne, S. G. lxii. 704). He holds, however, on another occasion, somewhat different language, advising masters to give those slaves whom they do not really require, instruction in some useful art, and then, when they are able to earn their own livelihood, to set them free. But he admits that this advice is unpalatable to his hearers,—φορτικός εἰμι τοῖς ἀκούουσιν (ad Epist. i. ad Cor., Hom. 40; Migne, S. G. lxi. 354). Isidore, the learned abbot of Pelusium, puts forward the singular theory that the servile condition may even be preferable to that of the freeman, because in the day of judgment the slave might plead in his defence that he had been compelled to obey the mandates of his earthly master (Epist. bk. iv. 12 and 169). Here, however, says Prof. Babington, "he is not giving his own counsel, but paraphrasing St. Paul" (Influence of Christianity, p. 29). It is a somewhat too sweeping assertion made by the last-named writer, that the writings of St. Basil, Ephraim the Syrian, Pseudo-Ambrose, Chrysostom, Jerome, Salvian, and Leo the Great do not contain a hint that slavery is unlawful or improper; but it is certain that none of them advocate its abolition. Theodorus Cyrensis, in his seventh oration, de Providentiâ, puts forward the view that slavery is a punishment inflicted on the human race which, while it convicts man of sin, bears witness to the justice of the Creator (Migne, S. G. lxxxiii. 676). So completely, indeed, did the church at this period dissociate the theory of the slave's spiritual equality with the freeman from that of his civil rights, that at the Council of Gangra (circ. 379) an anathema was pronounced against anyone who should make the former theory a ground for instigating a slave to repudiate his master's authority (Hardouin, Conc. i. 530). Hefele, who cannot be supposed to understate the argument in defence of the church, admits that fathers and councils alike systematically discouraged the self-assertion of freedom (Beiträge, i. 216). Enfranchisement was generally regarded as the reward of exceptional merit, and was often associated with some religious festivals; according to Gregory of Nyssa, especially with the celebration of Easter (Migne, S. G. xlvi. 637).^e How far the church was from proclaiming a general denunciation of slavery is to be inferred from the fact that in the year 503 the household of pope Symmachus was largely composed of slaves, and that, in the course of this pontiff's struggle with Laurentius, the royal commissioner sent by Theodoric subjected them to torture in order to extract evidence bearing upon the matter in dispute (Milman, Lat. Christianity, bk. iii. c. 3). Christianity, to quote the language of Milman (Lat. Christianity, bk. iii. c. 5), had taken slaves "out of the class of brute beasts or inanimate things, to be transferred like cattle or other goods from one master to another, which the owner might damage or destroy with as much impunity as any other property; and placed them in that of human beings, equally under the care of Divine Providence and gifted with the same immortality But the abrogation of slavery was not contemplated even as a remote possibility. A general enfranchisement seems never to have dawned on the wisest and best of the Christian writers."

^a This passage appears conclusive against the argument of bishop Horsley (Babington, Influence of Christianity, &c. p. 16), that St. Paul in denouncing "menstealers" (ἀνδραποδιστὰι) intends to convey a condemnation of slavery as an institution. His reference is plainly to those who gained a livelihood by kidnapping—a practice including free men and children, as well as slaves, and selling them into captivity in other lands. The charity of the church, throughout our period, was largely devoted to redeeming these unfortunate victims (see Cyprian, Epist. 60 (Migne, iv. 99); Lactantius, Div. Inst. vi. 12; Ambrose, Off. Lib. ii. 28], but such efforts, however valuable as evidence of Christian philanthropy, cannot be regarded as proof of a desire to abolish slavery at home. Of this, the law of king Ine of Wessex, in the 7th century, gives decisive proof. "If anyone sell his own countryman, bond or free, though he be guilty, over the sea, let him pay for him according to his 'wer'" (Stubbs, Documents, p. 61).

(iii) From the accession of Justinian to the death of Gregory the Great.—Although the efforts both of the legislator and of the church up to the commencement of this period must be looked upon as tending rather to the amelioration of the condition of the slave than to the abolition of slavery, events, in the mean time, were conspiring to bring about a more important change,—that whereby slavery, as a political institution, was gradually supplanted by serfdom. From the earliest days of the empire, the cultivation of the soil (the vital question with the civil administrator) appears as carried on mainly by two distinct classes,—the slave and the "colonus"; the first cultivating the land solely for his master's profit, the second receiving payment for his labour or renting the land of the proprietor. Owing to a conjunction of causes, into which it is here impossible to enter, the owners of the large estates found, with the advance of the 3rd century, the supply of labour altogether inadequate to the demand. In the reign of Honorius (A.D. 395-423) this evil had grown to such an extent that in Campania, the most fertile region of Italy, no less than 528,042 jugera were exempted from taxation owing to the fact that they had been deserted by the cultivator (Cod. Theod. XI. xxviii. 2; Haelen, p. 1120).

Against these difficulties legislation (as is clearly to be seen in the Theodosian Code) had long been contending, but in the meantime the condition of the "colonus" had been one of steady and continuous degeneration.^f His rights as a freeman had been repeatedly disregarded; his property had been confiscated, and he and his family reduced to the position of serfs, under what has been described as the state's "imperious necessity of procuring and preserving instruments for the cultivation of land" [Maine (Sir H.), Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 150]. To quote the description of M. Wallon, the "colonus" shared the condition of a slave without being legally such, and partook of the condition without enjoying the rights of a freeman. From the reign of Constantius, this anomalous condition of things is frequently referred to in legislation; but it was not until the reign of Justinian that a series of fresh enactments took formal cognisance of the grievances under which the "colonus" laboured and defined his status and rights. The result of this legislation, according to Savigny, was to produce a kind of amalgamation of the "coloni" and the "servi," whereby the heredity of labour, when associated with the cultivation of the soil, became a recognised theory in law (Mém. Acad. de Berlin, 1822-1823), and it would even appear to have been the design of the legislator to obliterate, as far as possible, all distinctions between the two classes. In a law of Justinian, indeed, we find the question distinctly propounded as to what real difference can be supposed to exist between slaves and "ascriptitii," "when," it says, "both are in the power of their lord, who is equally able to enfranchise the slave (along with his private hoard), and to exclude from his overlordship the 'ascriptitius' along with the tract which he cultivates" (Cod. Just. XI. xlvii. 22; Kriegel, ii. 702). Every freeman who had cultivated the same land for thirty years, was now declared to be a "colonus," and as such was forbidden to transfer his labour to other territory (Cod. Just. XI. xlvii. 23); if he attempted to escape, he might be recaptured and chastised by his employer. He was disqualified both for civil and military functions (ib. XI. xlvii. 11 and 18; Kriegel, ii. 700-701). He could bring no legal action against his employer, unless for arbitrary raising of his rent or some personal injury sustained by himself or one of his family (ib. XI. xlix. 1-2; Kriegel, ii. 704). The slave, on the other hand, was gradually relieved from those disabilities which had hitherto distinguished him from the "colonus." He could no longer be sold away from the land which he cultivated. In his own person, in his rights over his wife and children, and in the right of acquiring and bequeathing property, he ranked as a freeman.

As was the case with the "ascriptitius," election to the episcopal dignity rendered him, ipso facto, free,—"Post creationem autem a servili et adscriptitii conditione episcopos liberos esse jubemus" (Novell. cxiii. 4; Kriegel, iii. 544).

It will be seen, from the foregoing evidence, that as regards that large portion of the servile class whose labour was bestowed on the land, their condition in the 6th century differed considerably from that of the agricultural labourer in the early days of the empire. It was much inferior to that of the ancient "colonus," but it was a great improvement upon that of the slave,—a circumstance which requires to be borne in mind when we observe that it was in the same century, especially during the pontificate of Gregory the Great, that the territorial possessions of the church first begun to form an important element in its history and policy. Of the relations of the church to the labour question the letters of Gregory afford valuable illustration. Among them there is one to Venantius, bishop of Luna (the great seaport on the confines of Liguria), from which it appears that a community of Jews, holding lands in the diocese, were also proprietors of Christian slaves. Gregory, having been consulted by Venantius, distinctly lays it down as a rule that no Jew can be allowed to hold Christian men in bondage, but he goes on to say that, in the present instance, although those over whom these Jews assert their claim may be free men in point of law, yet notwithstanding, inasmuch as they have for a lengthened period continued to cultivate these same lands, they are bound by the circumstances of the case, and must accordingly continue to cultivate these lands and to pay their rents to the proprietors, besides complying with all the obligations legally binding upon "coloni" or "originarii,"^g but that no further burden is to be imposed upon them (Epist. iv. 21; Migne, lxxvii. 700).

This important letter, which M. Wallon (Hist. de l'Esclavage, iii. 312) regards as embodying the imperial legislation of the period, as conceived under the conditions above described, would appear to afford unquestionable proof that the position of the "colonus" at this time was one which secured to him a considerable degree of freedom. The antipathy of the church to the enslaving of Christian men by Jews or pagans begins now to be very strongly marked.^h A decree of the Council of Mâcon, A.D. 581, directs that Jewish or pagan proprietors shall be bound to surrender Christian slaves for a ransom of 12 solidi; and that any Christian shall be empowered to ransom a slave at such a price, whether it be his design to retain him in his possession or to set him at liberty (Sirmond, i. 373). The criticism of Overbeck (Studien, &c.

^g The "coloni" by descent, as distinguished from those who were such by agreement, the "ascriptitii." The influence of the question of labour in connexion with the land is to be recognised in many directions: thus a decree of the Council of Agde (A.D. 506) forbids the enfranchisement of the slaves of monasteries, holding it unjust "ut monachis quotidianum rurale opus facientibus, servi eorum libertatis otio potiuntur" (Mansi, Conc. viii. 334).

^h As the complement to this sentiment we may note that which considered the enslaving of pagan captives in war justifiable (see Biot, de l'Abolition de l'Esclavage, p. 233).

^f For the main facts which illustrate this gradual descent of the "colonus" from his ancient freedom, see Biot, de l'Abolition de l'Esclavage, pp. 177-181.

p. 211) that this aversion took its rise in mere religious bigotry, and was contrary to the theory of the primitive church, breathing rather of the ancient pagan prejudice against the barbarian (Plato, Repub. v. 15), appears harsh and overstrained. It is also to be remembered that the exaggerated importance now discernible as attached by the church to a formal observance of religious duties, e.g. fasting, keeping of saints' days, &c., must have operated very strongly in the same direction. The Christian in slavery to a pagan master could hardly have avoided living in the habitual commission of mortal sin; and to no object were Gregory's efforts more ardently devoted than to the suppression of the slave-trade as carried on by the Jews in his day (Epist. iv. 9; Migne, lxxvii. 689; see also pp. 498, 652, 868, 953, 954, 1016). Writing to Theoderic and Theodebert, kings of Frankland, he expresses his surprise that they should permit any Jews in their dominions to possess slaves (Epist. ix. 110; Migne, lxxvii. 1018). It seems accordingly that the condition of these "coloni" at Luna was such as he would never have sanctioned, had it not left them free to observe Christian worship and perform the chief duties of the Christian life unmolested.

On the other hand, he appears to have held the theory already referred to, which looked upon one Christian in bondage to another as simply the result of the divine decree finding expression in human institutions (Epist. iii. 18; x. 66; xii. 4; Migne, lxxvii. 637, 1089, 1210); nor can it be denied that this theory appears sometimes to have been construed by him in a sense repugnant to more enlightened views. Thus, when directing Januarius, bishop of Cagliari, to take vigorous measures against pagans, aruspices, and sorcerers, he says that if slaves they are to be beaten and subjected to torture, but if free men, are to be subjected simply to imprisonment (Epist. ix. 65; Migne, lxxvii. 982). But, notwithstanding, it is in the letters of this pontiff that M. Biot considers we have the earliest example of the Christian sentiment of liberty as the natural right of man, finding expression in a definite act of manumission; this is on the occasion of bestowing their freedom on two slaves, Montanus and Thomas, when Gregory compares their enfranchisement from the yoke which the law has placed upon them to the liberty which Christ came to win for all mankind—"quos ab initio natura liberos protulit, et jus gentium iugo substituit servitutis" (Epist. vi. 12; Migne, lxxvii. 804).

The decisions of Gregory having formed, in almost every important question, the rule of the Latin church during centuries after his time, the theory to which he here gives expression, may be regarded as that which continued to prevail to the conclusion of our period, whereby slavery was looked upon as an admitted antagonism between "natura" and the "jus gentium."

(iv) From the death of Gregory the Great to the commencement of the 9th century: (a) in the Eastern Empire; (B) in Latin Christendom; (γ) among Teutonic nations, prior to the introduction of Latin institutions.

(a) The influences of legislation and religion, in the eastern provinces of the empire, combined steadily to diminish the number of slaves (Gibbon, ch. xlv.; Wallon, Hist. de l'Esclavage, iii. 452), and, according to Finlay (Hist. of Greece, ed. Tozer, ii. 220), were aided by conditions more favourable to free labour, operating more immediately "in extinguishing predial slavery, and repressing the most important branch of the slave-trade, by supplying the cities with free emigrants." The evidence afforded by legislation is to be studied, after the 6th century, chiefly in the enactments of Basil the Macedonian (emp. 867-886) and of his son Leo the Philosopher, and is described in its main features by M. Wallon (iii. 452, 453). It is to be noted that the latter emperor revoked the law of Justinian which conferred freedom on slaves who had taken refuge in churches or monasteries, in the event of their giving satisfactory evidence of having been subjected to ill-usage.

The monasteries of the East appear to have been distinguished by their repudiation of the employment of slave labour, a principle emphatically laid down by St. Platon and Theodore Studites. The latter, writing to his disciple Nicholas (recently created an abbat), instructs him that he is not to have a single slave, whether for his own service, or that of the monastery, or for the culture of the land; "for this," he says, "is permissible, like marriage, only to those who lead a secular life" (Sirmond, Opera, Paris, 1696, v. 84).

(B) In those countries where Latin influences continued to predominate, the close connexion of the question of slavery with that of the cultivation of the land appears to have hindered the progress of emancipation. Among the Western Franks, the condition of the slave differed, according to Guizot, from the ancient servitude of paganism, in that it was not "uniforme, constante et séparée de celle des hommes libres par un profond abîme" (Essais, p. 214); and owing to the fact, that it was thus vaguely defined, it afforded conditions which ultimately resulted in the establishment of freedom. He concurs, however, in the opinion expressed by Gibbon (ch. xxxviii.), that from the 5th to the 10th century "the laws and manners of Gaul uniformly tended to promote the increase, and to confirm the duration, of personal servitude;" but, at the same time, considers (Essais, p. 208) that in the many cases of enfranchisement that come under our notice during this period, religious ideas suggested the preponderating motive. The Formulae of Marculfus (a monk of the 7th century) systematically represent the bestowing of freedom on the slave as a meritorious action that will be rewarded in a future state (Migne, lxxxvii. 747). It would appear that it was customary for the king, on the birth of a son, to bestow freedom on three slaves on each of his farms (villae), and the formula used on these occasions is preserved in the same writer (bk. ii. 52). The Riparian Code (which exhibits an admixture of Latin and barbaric elements) defines three distinct modes of enfranchisement, according to which the slave was known as a "denarius," a "tabularius," or a "chartularius." On the first of these, freedom was conferred according to Salic law,—the slave holding a coin (denarius) in his hand, and the king thereupon striking his hand, so as to cause the coin to fly into his face, and pronouncing him a free man (Marculfus, Form. i. 22). The second mode ("secundum legem Romanam") corresponded exactly to that prescribed by the law of Constantine of the year 316; the third (whereby the freedman was known as a "chartularius") reproduces the method prescribed in the law of 321 (for both of these see supra, sec. ii.). It is the opinion of Guizot (Essais, p. 213) that none of these modes secured complete freedom to the enfranchised slave, but that, in each case, he was subsequently under the necessity of attaching himself to a "patronus," who, in the first case, was the king; in the second, the church; while the "chartularius" elected to which of these two he would be bound.

A decree of the Council of Châlons (A.D. 650) prohibits the selling of slaves out of the realm of king Clovis II. (Sirmond, i. 491); and another of the year 743 prohibits their being, in any case, sold to Jews (Mansi, xii. 384). The abbat Smaragdus, in the reign of Charles the Great, exhorted that monarch not to reduce captives of war to slavery, and also to set free his own slaves (Biot, u. s. p. 311). The 104th canon of the Council of Aachen (A.D. 816) exhibits what may be regarded as the prevailing ecclesiastical view of slavery at the close of our period,—that it is to be looked upon as a consequence of the Fall, and that, although the Creator regards not the comparative intelligence (rationem) of individuals, yet He has destined some to slavery and others to freedom, in order that the "tendency of the slave to do ill may be restrained by the power of the master" (Mansi, xiv. 211).

The chronicle of the monastery of Farfi in the duchy of Spoleto, in an enumeration of the slaves and dependants of the monastery made towards the close of the 7th century, shews that these slaves resided in separate cottages, and were permitted to hold property of their own,—a condition closely resembling, if not identical with, that of the "colonus" (Muratori, Scriptt. II. ii. 428). In the year 815, Lewis the Pious, in a charter confirming the rights and privileges of the same monastery, refers to its "servi" and "ancillae" as well as its "libellarii" (= "tabularii") and "chartulati" (ib. II. ii. 365). Arichis, duke of Beneventum, in a capitulary of the year 774, defines the relations of servants to their masters as one of complete subjection,—"ita tamen ut ejus, qui eos acceperit, disciplinis et imperio, sicut servi subiaceant" (ib. II. ii. 336).

In Spain, where the laws of the Visigoths represented a kind of amalgamation of their own code with that of Theodosius, the enactments relating to the condition of the slave offer few points of material difference when compared with the Roman law,—the chief distinction being that slaves were permitted to engage in military service (Biot, p. 402).

(γ) Under the influence of the spirit of Teutonic conquest, the growth of personal freedom again received a check. "The fruitful cause of personal slavery," says Gibbon (ed. Smith, iv. 374), "which had been almost suppressed by the peaceful sovereignty of Rome, was again revived and multiplied by the perpetual hostilities of the independent barbarians." The theory maintained by one writer¹ on our subject,—that slavery, strictly so-called, never existed among the German races, and that contact with the Latin race and with Roman institutions tended rather to aggravate the condition of serfdom as existing among them,—is at variance with the best established conclusions. Tacitus (Germ. c. 25) clearly implies that the slave's life could be taken by his master with impunity. "It cannot be denied," says Professor Stubbs, "that slavery in the strictest sense was an early, if not a primitive, institution of the race" (Const. Hist. i. 78). In direct contravention of the law of Valerian and Gallienus [supra, sec. i. (8)], the laws of the Merovingian dynasty in Frankland permitted a freeman to sell himself into slavery, and even prescribed the formula (Marculfus, Form. ii. 28). The researches of Jastrow clearly prove that the earliest codes of the Frisians, Saxons, Thuringians, Franks and Alemanni, all involve that fundamental violation of natural law which represented the slave as a thing rather than a Person. He had indeed a recognised legal value, which was determined like that of other "things," by assessment. In the Saxon and Thuringian codes this value is fixed by law, but solely as a question of his worth to his owner. In the older Salic Code and in that of the Alemanni, it is estimated with reference to the "wergild" of the freeman and of the "lite." The Kentish Laws of Ethelbert are the first which deal with the question of his "Mannwerth,"—equivalent, says Jastrow, to his "wergild," only under another name. "In some respects," says Professor Stubbs, "the practice of the law is better than the theory: the slave is entitled to his two loaves a day, and his holy days are secured to him. He can purchase his freedom with savings which in some unexplained way the law has allowed him to keep, and the spiritual law can enforce a penance on the master for illtreating him. But his status descends to his children; all his posterity, unless the chain is broken by emancipation, are born slaves" (Const. Hist. i. 79; see also Kemble, Saxons in England, i. 185-225). In the laws of Ine, king of Wessex (circ. 690), this "Mannwerth" becomes technically a "wergild" (see Jastrow, Zur strafrechtlichen Stellung der Sklaven bei Deutschen und Angelsachsen, p. 41). One of the laws of Wihtrid, king of Kent, made at a witenagemot held at Berghamsted in 690, requires that the head of a family who gives them meat on a fast, shall do penance by devoting his "hals-fang" (price of commutation for punishment in the pillory) to redeeming "bond or free" (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 235-6). To Theodore of Tarsus is attributed the merit of obtaining in the West the adoption of the axiom of Eastern monasticism,—that "the monastery could have no slaves" (Hefele, Beiträge, i. 217). The same ecclesiastic, however, allows men to sell themselves into slavery "for meat," i.e. in order to avoid starvation (Haddan and Stubbs, ib. iii. 202). "Manumission," says Mr. Green, "became frequent in wills, as the clergy taught that such a gift was a boon to the soul of the dead. At the synod of Calnith the bishops bound themselves to free at their decease all serfs on their estates who had been reduced to serfdom by want or crime. Usually the slave was set free before the altar or in the church-porch, and the Gospel-book bore written on its margins the record of his emancipation . . . The slave-trade from English ports was prohibited by law, but the prohibition long remained ineffective. A hundred years later than Dunstan the wealth of English nobles was said sometimes to spring from breeding slaves for the market. It was not till the reign of the first Norman king that the preaching of Wulstan and the influence of Lanfranc suppressed the trade in its last stronghold, the port of Bristol" (Short History, pp. 54, 55).

The conclusions to which the foregoing outline of facts appears to point, as to the extent to which the Christianity of the first eight centuries modified the conditions of the slave, admit of being very concisely summarized. During the first three centuries Christianity could scarcely hope materially to influence that legislation by which it was itself persecuted, but, in conjunction with the philosophic teaching of the Stoics, it brought about a change of sentiment which led to the consideration of the whole question of slavery from a different standpoint. It spoke of him as a man in this life, and as destined to immortality hereafter. Of the general abolition of a system which underlay the entire fabric of the state and of society, it had little or no conception; but with the fall of the Western empire the whole question of labour, as associated with the cultivation of the land, assumed a phase which ultimately involved the suppression of the harshest features of the ancient slavery. Concurrently with this change, Christianity was gradually raising the condition of the slave by admitting him to the sacraments of the church and to the ranks of the clergy, as well as by the manner in which it encouraged his complete enfranchisement as a Christian act, and associated it with Christian observances. Even the intolerant spirit which, at this period, began to be displayed towards the Jew and the pagan, is to some extent redeemed by the fact that it led to the essential injustice of slavery being more fully recognised. With these considerations before us, it seems difficult not to assent to the view of M. Wallon, that when, at a later time, with the commencement of feudalism, the question of the cultivation of the soil entered upon another phase, there was no security in existing institutions that the serf might not relapse into the condition of the slave, Christianity interposed, and not merely averted any such retrograde movement, but paved the way for the complete emancipation of the serf; while, by the admission of Gibbon, "the custom of enslaving prisoners of war was totally extinguished in the 13th century by the influence of Christianity" (Decline and Fall, c. xxxviii. note 96).

SOCIAL LIFE. The design of this article is to point out and illustrate what appear to have been the distinguishing characteristics of Christian society during the first eight centuries. As, however, these characteristics are found to differ considerably according to the varying conditions of the age, any attempt to bring the phenomena of different periods within a single outline could hardly but prove fallacious; it is accordingly proposed to consider them as they present themselves to our notice at three different eras: (I.) During the first three centuries. (II.) In the empire, subsequent to the recognition of Christianity by the state. (III.) Among Teutonic communities, subsequent to their nominal conversion to Christianity.

(I.) The Christian life, as conceived in the primitive church, may be said to have been dominated by two distinct, and, at first sight, somewhat antagonistic conceptions. The apostolic injunction to be "not conformed to this world," but "transformed in the renewing of the mind," and the teaching which led the early Christians to regard themselves as "an elect people, a royal priesthood, a holy race," were combined with a theory of the relations of the Christian citizen to mankind at large, which completely broke down the barriers of the old Roman exclusiveness and led him to look upon mankind as, to use the expression of Tertullian (Apol. c. 38), one great republic. It is certain, however, that, partly from a sincere desire to inculcate principles which involved the recognition of a universal brotherhood, partly from anxiety to discourage notions which caused them to be regarded with suspicion and dislike, the earlier Christians emphatically disclaimed the adoption of distinctive institutions or peculiar habits. Thus the author of the Epistle to Diognetus (c. 5) says that Christians "are in no way distinguished by their country, speech, or customs from other men;" that "they neither dwell in separate cities, nor use any peculiar dialect, nor do they lead an unusual (ἰσδιόμορον) mode of life" (Bunsen, Anal. Ante-Nic. i. 111).

It is in perfect harmony with historical experience at large that, though the centres in which Christianity first assumed a distinctive social character were noted for their luxury, dissipation, and immorality, the life of the Christians themselves in this uncongenial atmosphere appears (so far as we are able to arrive at the evidence) to have been faithful to an unusual extent to the Christian ideal. The corruptions that surrounded the convert in cities such as Antioch, Alexandria, Corinth, Rome, and Carthage were, in fact, calculated to produce in minds not totally depraved a reaction of feeling which materially contributed to preserve them from yielding to the debasing influences of the example set by their fellow citizens.^a Origen (cont. Cels. iii. 30), when referring to the life of the Christians in these great cities, does not hesitate to affirm that even the least exemplary among them greatly surpassed the majority of the pagan community (πολλῶν κρείττους τυγχάνειν τῶν ἐν τοῖς δήμοις ἐκκλησιῶν, Migne, J'atrol. Graec. xi. 466). If to this condition of moral isolation we add the sense of estrangement from the state, by which, if not actually persecuted, the earlier Christians were generally looked upon with mistrust, the Christian life at this period almost necessarily involved a certain exclusiveness and habitual caution in intercourse with the world without.

While, again, in all the ordinary relations of civil life the Christian could conscientiously disclaim eccentricity or incompatibility with prevailing practice, his religion and his conduct, as derived from that religion, were such that neither the one nor the other could pass unobserved. At home, his domestic life (the life which always affords the best guarantees for the right and virtuous discharge of the duties of the citizen) offered a superficial resemblance to that of the pagan in that the observance of worship was regular and systematic, but essentially differed from it in so far that what in the one was looked upon as a mere ceremony was observed in the other as a spiritual exercise. The three canonical hours of the early church, the 3rd, the 6th, and the 9th (HOURS OF PRAYER), were marked out as times of devotion. In the family circle, at the third hour, the Scriptures were read, the common prayer was offered, and the Hallelujah Psalm sung. Then followed the first meal of the day, preceded, like every other meal, by a special prayer for the divine blessing, an observance which, to use the expression of Clemens of Alexandria, converted every meal into a sacrament (Paed. ii. 1; Tertullian, de Orat. c. 20). When the first meal was over, the mother and her children exchanged the kiss of peace and then separated, where necessary, for their daily tasks (Const. Aegypt. ii. 57, 62; Bunsen, Anal. Ante-Nic. ii. 472-3). Besides the hours above specified, the duty of private prayer was strictly enjoined (Cyprian, de Orat. Dom. c. 4) at sunrise and at sunset (ib. c. 35), before retiring to rest, and at midnight. The Scriptures were daily to be read, but their right comprehension, it was held, could be looked for only when this exercise had been preceded by prayer (Origen, de Orat. c. 31). Husband and wife were enjoined both to pray together and to study the Scriptures together, a precept involving a view of the conjugal relations which strikingly contrasts with the reply of Critobulus to Socrates (Xenophon, Oecon. iii. 12) that "he spoke with no one less than with his wife." Even in the exercise of hospitality prayer found a place, and the householder was enjoined not to let his guest depart without a joint observance of this rite (Tert. de Orat. c. 21).

Dominated by this conception, each home became a sanctuary, each day a holy-day, and the life of the perfected Christian, to quote the expression of Clemens, one long service of adoration. ἅπας δὲ ὁ βίος αὐτοῦ πανήγυρις μία (Strom. bk. vii.; Migne, Patrol. Graec. ix. 309). In all these observances, however, one feature is to be noted which offers the greatest contrast to the pagan domestic rites, namely, that they were not looked upon as a mystery to be guarded from the scrutiny of other families or races, but were readily shared with others and the doctrines they represented willingly explained, a spirit of propagandism taking the place of the exclusiveness characteristic of paganism.

Another important feature in the Christian home life was the altered position of the mother of the family, a change so considerable as to bring about a completely different conception of the relations of womanhood to society. While obedience to her husband was enjoined as a duty upon the wife, that duty ceased when it came in collision with one of a yet higher order (Justin, Apol. ii. 2). She was looked upon as capable of attaining to an equal degree of perfection (Clemens, Strom. iv. 19; Migne, ib. viii. 223), as his equal in all relations (Clemens, Paed. i. 4; Migne, ib. viii. 37), and endowed with precisely the same nature (Clemens, Strom. iv. 8; Migne, ib. viii. 213). She was to aspire to wisdom in a like degree, φιλοσοφῆτέον οὖν καὶ ταῖς γυναῖξιν ἐμφερώς τοῖς ἀνδράσι (ib. iv. 8). While enjoined to be a stay-at-home (ib. iv. 8; ib. viii. 214), the sphere of her activity in the domestic circle was at once extended and ennobled. To the household industry of the Roman matron she added the higher function of instructing her children (Polycarp, ad Philippenses, c. 5), and in this relation her influence was often of incalculable importance. The mothers of Chrysostom, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Augustine, and Theodoret, were mainly instrumental in the conversion of their sons. Clement of Rome commends the Christians at Corinth because they taught their children moderation and chastity, μέτρια καὶ σεμνὰ νοεῖν (Epist. i. 1; Cotelierius, Patres Apost. i. 147). "Let our children," says his namesake of Alexandria, "share in the instruction which is of Christ" (Strom. iv. 17; Migne, viii. 222). Augustine, on the other hand, is to be found admitting that his father, who was indifferent to Christianity, was far more anxious to see him accomplished and eloquent than virtuous and modest (Conf. ii. 3). In the Epistle of Barnabas (c. 19) the writer enjoins every Christian to instruct his sons and daughters in the fear of the Lord from their youth upwards. Leonidas, the father of Origen, made his son commit daily to heart and repeat a set portion of Scripture (Euseb. H. E. vi. 2). The distrust with which parents regarded the appearance of their children in mixed assemblies (Clemens, Strom. iii. 11) was a reflex of their own sense of danger when mingling in pagan society, and their watchful and pious care in this respect stands in remarkable contrast to the declaration of Quintilian (I. ii. 8) that the rising generation of his day were corrupted before they could well understand the distinction between good and evil, and, so far from being demoralised by their school-fellows, often brought the contagion with them from their own homes.

The discipline of the Christian household was distinguished, again, by a spirit of greater gentleness, the sternness of the pagan father towards his son being exchanged for a tone of loving admonition (Cyprian, Test. adv. Judæos, iii. 71).

While such were the influences that prevailed in his domestic life, the Christian citizen left his home to pursue his daily avocations in the world inspired by a teaching which led him to recognise in every other man a brother, and armed with a moral code which was equal to every question of conscience that might arise, a code which was, in the language of Rousseau, "always certain, always true, always single, and always in harmony with itself." In singular contrast to that feeling of hatred for foreigners on which Plato (Mencæmus, p. 245) congratulates his fellow-citizens, Justin (Apol. i. 14, ii. 13) expressly notes that whereas sympathy and intercourse had before existed only between those who belonged to the same nationality, Christianity admitted no such limitations. "We," he says, "who hated and destroyed one another, and on account of their different manners would not use a common hearth and fire^b with men of a different tribe, now, since the coming of Christ, live familiarly with them, and pray for our enemies." Even towards those who were not of the same faith the church recognised the obligation of shewing friendship and of exchanging friendly offices, "necessitas amicitiarum olliciorumque gentilium" (Tert. de Cultu Fem. ii. 11; Migne, i. 1329); while all alike, young and old, bond and free, Greek and barbarian, were equally admissible as members of the Christian polity (Clemens, Strom. iv. 8; Migne, Patrol. Graec. viii. 213). The exigencies of the state at this period forbade, indeed, any to entertain the notion of a general abolition of slavery [SLAVERY], but the Christian could look upon the slave as one born by misfortune in a condition which, however pitiable, involved no religious inequality, and which he was bound to ameliorate by acts of kindness.

Underlying this new and greatly enhanced estimate of man as an individual, there was the Christian theory of the sanctity of human life, which rested, in turn, on the belief in the immortality of the soul. The procuring of abortion, regarded among pagan communities as scarcely deserving of censure, was from the first systematically denounced by the church. The mother guilty of this crime was excluded by a decree of the council of Ancyra (A.D. 314) from the sacrament until the hour of death [CHILDREN]. Infanticide, and the exposure of newly-born infants, a common practice under the empire, and, according to St Ambrose (Hexæm. v. 18), especially prevalent among the poor, as abortion was more the practice of the wealthy, was shunned by the Christian community with horror. "Christians," says the writer of the Epistle to Diognetus (c. 5), "marry and beget children, like the rest of mankind, but they do not cast away their offspring." (See also Lactantius, Div. Inst. vi. 20; Cod. Theod. XI. xxvii. 1 and 2; ib. V. vii. 1; Allard, Les Esclaves Chréts. etc. p. 370.)

But while the conception of social obligations and sympathies became thus greatly extended, in one particular relation, that of the individual citizen to the civil power, it involved a different standard from that of paganism, and one which was also somewhat lower. The Christian placed humanity above the city, and repudiated a theory which involved the obliteration of individual rights whenever they came in conflict with the supposed necessities of the state. The duties of private life, those of the man to himself, to his family, and to God, were now regarded as paramount, and patriotism was no longer the supreme duty of the citizen. The patriotism of the pagan, indeed, it has been truly said, was but a species of refined egoism by which he demanded back with interest all that he gave to the commonweal. On the Christian the love of his neighbour was enjoined as a principle, a principle which rendered the interpretation of all social duties easy and intelligible (Clem. Rom. ad Corinth. i. 49). The emperor Julian (Epist. 49) could not but contrast the kindness of Christians to strangers with the ordinary pagan indifference, and indicates this feature, together with the care shewn by them for the tombs of the dead and their external decorum of demeanour, as three points well deserving the imitation of pagans.

On the other hand, the early Christians were ready cheerfully to recognise all the customary obligations of the citizen to the commonwealth. Justin, in addressing the emperor Antoninus Pius, says, "We everywhere before all things endeavour to pay tribute and taxes to those whom you appoint" (Apol. i. 17; see also Tatian, cont. Graecos, c. 4; Apost. Const. iv. 13). The grandchildren of Jude, Eusebius tells us (E. H. iii. 20), when summoned before Domitian, pleaded in proof of their loyalty to the civil power the taxes which they paid from their manual labour, exhibiting their hands callous with toil. Tertullian (Apol. c. 33) declares that the Christians are actuated by a more reasonable sentiment of loyalty towards the emperor than that of the pagan community. Origen affirms that by their prayers they render effective support to the imperial cause, "composing a sacred army by their intercessions with the Deity" (cont. Cels. bk. viii.; Migne, Patrol. Graec. xi. 797). His language to Celsus appears to imply that they often declined civic offices, but he justifies such conduct on the ground that in so doing they are able to give themselves "to the more holy and pressing service of the church in saving the souls of men" (ib.).

In the choice of a profession or a craft, the Christian was necessarily under a certain disadvantage when compared with his pagan fellow-citizen, from the disfavour with which his creed was regarded by the state on the one hand, and from the limitations imposed by the church on the other. By the church he was forbidden to engage in any art or occupation which either directly or indirectly subverted the rites of idolatry (TRADES). The profession of the astrologer or the conjurer (the latter at this period a frequent and fruitful source of gain) was equally unlawful (Neander, Denkwürdigkeiten, &c. i. 120). He might assume the profession of arms when it had been imposed upon him by the state, but its voluntary adoption was held to disqualify him for Christian communion (Const. Aegypt. ii. 41). The calling of an actor or public dancer was altogether forbidden him (ACTOR, THEATRE). His adoption of that of a "grammaticus" or teacher of pagan learning was discouraged, partly on account of the character of the literature which he would be required to explain and comment on, partly from the close connexion of the profession with the observance of pagan festivals and ceremonies (SCHOOLMASTER). Beyond these necessary restrictions, his choice was circumscribed only by pagan prejudices against his creed: "It is lawful," says Clemens (Paed. iii. 11; Migne, Patrol. Graec. viii. 10), "to take part in public affairs (πολιτεύεσθαι); to engage in the business of the world, provided that this be done honestly, and to buy and sell, provided that one has but one price."

Idleness was systematically discouraged, and, in contrast to pagan notions, the dignity of labour was upheld and enforced. The Apostolic Constitutions (iv. 2) direct bishops to endeavour to find employment for artisans out of work, and especially for orphans. Barnabas enjoins those to whom his epistle is addressed to labour with their hands that they may thereby gain forgiveness for past sins, εἰς λύτρωσιν τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν σου (Cotelerius, Patres Apost. i. 52). It was, however, the prevalent theory of the church, at least from the 4th century, that the clergy were entitled to be exempted from manual labour (MANUAL LABOUR).

The acquirement of wealth does not appear to have been pronounced unlawful by the church, but the teachers of this period insist strongly that when acquired it should be devoted to right purposes; money, according to Clemens (Quis dives salvetur, c. 14; Migne, Patrol. Graec. ix. 338), being an instrument, not in itself an end. If lawfully obtained, whether by frugality, enterprise, or inheritance, there was nothing wrongful in its mere possession, but it was to be devoted to charitable purposes, not hoarded in a spirit of avarice. It indicates very significantly the new spirit of philanthropy fostered by Christianity, that although slavery as an institution still continued to absorb to but a slightly diminished extent the classes which at later times appealed mainly to public charity, acts of systematic benevolence on the part of the church are to be found becoming much more common. The church at Rome, in the 3rd century, supported no less than 1500 poor (Euseb. H. E. vi. 43). Nor was this charity limited to those who had embraced the Christian faith. The spontaneity of this benevolence, as it presented itself to the observation of Pachomius, impressed him so deeply as to bring about his conversion. A recent writer has said, probably with justice, that the care shewn by Christians for the unfortunate and the poor is the feature which offers the strongest point of contrast to pagan society in these times (Schmidt, La Société Civile, p. 351). "Almsgiving," says Chrysostom (in Matt. Hom. xlix. 3), "is the first of trades for the rich;" and Fleury (Oeuvres, ed. Martin, p. 223) traces the principle of charity as one of the most prominent and well-sustained traditions of the church from apostolic times until the rise of monasticism.

This active principle of charity found a corresponding expression in the Christian's intercourse with those who were his equals or superiors in station. As, according to Origen (contr. Cels. Praef. c. 2), he preferred to vindicate the tenets which he had embraced rather by rectitude of life than skill in argument, so he held that his sentiments towards his fellow-men were best shewn by his unwillingness not merely to do them ill, but even to wish it, or even to speak or think evil concerning them (Tert. Apol. c. 36). Litigation was especially avoided, and the Pauline injunction to avoid all recourse to the pagan tribunals (1 Cor. vi. 6-8) became a permanent tradition in the church (Cyprian, Test. cont. Judaeos, iii. 44). "Accustomed," says Hallam (Middle Ages, c. vii. pt. 1), "to feel a strong aversion to the imperial tribunals, and even to consider a recurrence to them as hardly consistent with their profession, the early Christians retained somewhat of a similar prejudice even after the establishment of their religion. The arbitration of their bishops still seemed a less objectionable mode of settling differences. And this arbitral jurisdiction was powerfully supported by a law of Constantine, which directed the civil magistrate to enforce the execution of episcopal awards." The church itself inculcated the practice (Apost. Const. ii. 45; Cotelerius, i. 246), and no circumstance tended more effectually to strengthen the influence of the clergy than this habitual reference of all matters in dispute among the Christians themselves to the arbitration of their pastors.

In his personal habits, the Christian was taught to practise moderation, all ostentation being systematically avoided. His diet was to be simple, and temperance both in eating and drinking were strictly enjoined upon him. Boys and girls, says Clemens, should not touch wine, but ought ἀπέχεσθαι τοῦ φαρμάκου τούτου (Paed. ii. 2; Migne, Patrol. Graec. viii. 65). Minucius Felix (Octav. c. 31; Migne, iii. 46) contrasts the moderation and modesty of the Christians at their banquets with the licence and excess customary among the heathen. The author of the Epistle to Diognetus speaks of the Christians as "living in the flesh and not after the flesh" (c. 5), and even the feasts held in honour of the emperor appear to have been shunned by them (Tert. Apol. c. 35). The usual accompaniment of the banquet—the revel (or κῶμος) with its lascivious dances and wanton songs—was, of course, equally to be avoided (Clemens, Paed. ii. 4; Migne, ib. viii. 70). In the matter of dress it is evident that the earlier Christians affected no peculiarity, the language of the writers of the period (see DRESS) appearing rather to imply that they followed too closely the fashion of the times. Even Clemens (Paed. iii. 11), while condemning undue luxury and effeminacy, says that "the wearing of gold ornaments and soft raiment is not altogether to be condemned, but only an undue fondness for such attire," and he quotes St. Paul (1 Cor. vii. 31). Tertullian, however (de Cult. Fem. ii. 11), seems to imply that among females the convert to the faith was distinguished by greater sobriety of apparel.

* It has been the endeavour of some writers to prove that the difference in this relation observable between pagan and Christian societies is to be referred to other than religious opinions. The main facts and arguments

In the furniture of his house the Christian was to aim at simplicity. "The use of gold and silver vessels," says Clemens (Paed. ii. 8), "is vain and idle, a mere illusion of the eye. The superfluous possession of such wealth evokes envy, it is hard to acquire, hard to keep, and ill-adapted for use." Silver plates and goblets, tripods of cedar, ebony, or ivory, bedsteads with gold and silver feet, purple curtains, &c., are enumerated by him as tokens of undue luxury, which the Christian should not possess.

Works of art adorned with representations of the deities of the pagan mythology would of course be banished from the Christian household, but there can be little doubt that during the first two centuries the tendency to asceticism among Christian communities led to an undue depreciation of art, especially in sculpture and ornament. Buonarrotti (de Vitris Coemeterialibus; Mamachi, i. 249) attributes to this fact the comparative rudeness of the devices on the Christian tombs (Hefele, Beiträge, i. 26).

In the question of lawful recreation and amusements, the broad principle laid down by Cyprian, that the scriptural code forbade the Christian to witness what it was unlawful for him to do—"Prohibuit enim spectari quod prohibuit geri" (de Spectac. c. 4; Migne, iv. 340)—afforded safe and intelligible guidance. The sanguinary gladiatorial conflicts which so delighted every class in those times were a spectacle altogether unlawful. "If," says Tertullian, "we can maintain that cruelty, impiety, and barbarity are lawful, let us to the amphitheatre" (de Spectac. c. 19). "What vileness," says Clemens, "is there which is not exhibited in the theatre? . . . They who, from the uncleanness of their own hearts, take pleasure therein, transfer the representations they have witnessed to their own homes" (Paed. iii. 11; Migne, Series Graec. viii. 109).

Of the isolation in which, according to some writers, the primitive Christians passed their lives (Renan, St. Paul, p. 562), few signs are observable in the 3rd century. "The Apostolical Constitutions," says Blunt (First Three Christian Centuries, p. 311), "abound in provisions for a mixed population of Christian and heathen thrown into the most intimate civic and social relations." Christians are not unfrequently to be found holding high public office and even important positions at court. The Christian father of St. Basil was one of the most influential citizens in Pontus. Eusebius (E. H. vi. 28) states that in the household of Alexander Severus, whose mother, Julia Mamaea, befriended Christianity, they were numerously represented. Theonas, bishop of Alexandria (A.D. 282-300), writing to Lucian, who held high office in the court of Constantine Chlorus, gives him detailed advice respecting his conduct in this difficult position: he was to practise impartial justice to rich and poor, never to grant access to the emperor for a bribe, to be courteous, benevolent, and modest on all occasions, and especially to obey and serve the emperor himself with the utmost fidelity, so long as in so doing he was not involved in a breach of religious duty (Biblioth. PP. Gallandi, iv. 69, 70). "If a Christian was appointed librarian, he was to take good care not to shew any contempt for secular knowledge and the ancient writers. He was advised to make himself familiar with the poets, philosophers, orators, and historians of classical literature, and while discussing their writings to take incidental opportunities of recommending the Scriptures, etc." (Newman, Arians, p. 68). Notwithstanding, however, many and eminent exceptions, it is evident that the larger proportion of the converts to Christianity during the first three centuries was drawn from the humbler classes of society. To Celsus, who made it a matter of reproach, that the new faith appealed to and was embraced by the most illiterate and simple of mankind, Origen contents himself with the general reply that Christianity was essentially catholic in character, and, while receiving accessions from all parts, did not exclude the young, the uneducated, and the slave (Origen, c. Cels. iii. 44; Migne, Patrol. Graec. xi. 476).

Although the foregoing outline is liable to the objection that the picture it presents is derived rather from the precepts which we find laid down by the authorities of the church than from facts in the actual lives of the early Christians themselves, there is good reason for believing that precept and practice in these ages were in closer agreement than perhaps at any subsequent period of church history. The observation of Milman (Lat. Christianity, bk. i. c. 2), that "early Christianity cannot be justly estimated from its writers," is applicable rather to the polemical character of many of their treatises—a feature which in no way detracts from the value of the didactic literature of the age, or the presumption therein afforded of large and increasing communities, like that at Rome, growing into power and importance amid quiet obscurity and the practice of a genuine though retiring Christianity. The impression which the very imperfect data that remain to us are calculated to produce—the heroism of those who from time to time were compelled to attest the sincerity of their convictions by encountering martyrdom—the reluctant admiration which the lives and tenets of the Christians evidently excited in the minds of the less prejudicial observers among the pagan party—all combine to prove that the natural recoil from the excessive demoralisation of society under the empire uniting with the lofty teaching of the new faith brought about a very high standard of practical morality.

Already, however, there were evidences of a considerable decline from the primitive simplicity and earnestness. Cyprian contrasts the lukewarmness of the church in Africa with the zeal of the apostolic age, when believers sold their possessions and gave them to the poor: "Now," he says, "we give not even tenths from our patrimony, and when the Lord bids us sell, we buy and store" (de Unit. c. 24; Migne, iv. 203). In another passage he says that long immunity from persecution had brought about a great decline in religious observance ("traditam nobis disciplinam pax longa corruerat"), and he looks upon the trial of the church under Decius as divinely designed to restore her "fallen and almost unconscious condition" (de Lapsis, c. 5; Migne, iv. 182). He cites as evidence not merely the increasing tendency to money-getting and avarice, but also the frequent marriages of Christians with pagans (ib. c. 6).

(II.) That Christianity deteriorated in genuineness and earnestness soon after its recognition by the state and its profession by successive emperors, is a generally admitted fact (Baur, Die Christl. Kirche, ii. 287; Pressensé, Hist. des trois premiers siècles de l'Eglise chrét. vol. v.; Schmidt, La Société Civile, &c. p. 484). Its very existence, it has been observed, was threatened by the vast numerical, but merely nominal accessions to its ranks (Hirscher, Die Christl. Moral, ed. 1851, i. 47). The fathers of the 4th century themselves frequently admit and deplore the degeneracy of their age when contrasted with apostolic times. Chrysostom speaks of the large numbers of professed Christians in his day whose sole religious observance consisted in coming to church once or twice in the year—ἅπας τοῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ ἢ δευτέρον παρ' ἡμῶν φοιτῶντα (de Bapt. Christi, c. 1; Migne, Patrol. Graec. xlix. 364). Augustine laments over the numerous defections in his flock, and compares the body of the church to a corpse. Those who make a profession of religion, he says, are often influenced by unworthy motives: this man has a lawsuit, and seeks to gain the good will of the clergy that they may interest themselves in his behalf; another takes refuge in the church from a powerful foe; another seeks to gain a friend, to accomplish a marriage, or to evade some responsibility, "ut aliquam pressuram hujus saeculi evadat" (in Joh. Evang. Tract. xxvi. 10; Migne, xxxv. 1600; Serm. xlvii. 17; Migne, xxxviii. 306). On the other hand, the few who sought to lead a really Christian life were often subjected to persecution and ridicule by the rest (in Ps. 90, Serm. i. 4; Migne, xxxvii. 1152). Maximus of Turin compares the absence of charity and good works in his day with the zeal of the apostolic age. So far from collecting money to lay it at the apostles' feet, the Christians of his day, he says, are to be seen dragging the victims of their extortion from the feet of the priests. If true wealth consists in good works (1 Tim. vi. 18), he fears that a wealthy man is scarcely to be found "in coetu nostro" (Hom. 94; Migne, lvii. 321).

That, as soon as Christianity had been taken under the protection and patronage of the emperor, large numbers should have professed its tenets from no better motives than those of self-interest and policy is sufficiently intelligible; but it is necessary also to take into account other causes which at this period acted with considerable potency, and in a direction unfavourable to morality and simplicity of life. Among these the most important appear to have been—

(1) The removal of the capital to Constantinople. By this important change the imperial court was brought directly under the enervating influences of Oriental habits and customs, and as the result there prevailed among the upper classes of society an amount of luxury and effeminacy unprecedented in the history of the empire. "The manners of the East," observes Milman (Hist. of Christianity, bk. iv. c. 1), "were too strong for the religion. With the first Christian emperor commenced that Oriental ceremonial, which it might almost seem that, rebuked by the old liberties of Rome, the imperial despot would not assume till he had founded another capital." Ammianus Marcellinus describes the court at the accession of Julian as "vitiorum omnium seminarium" (bk. xxii. c. 4). With the latter half of the century this evil is to be seen spreading not only in the East, but also in Rome and throughout Italy. The sermons of Chrysostom, Maximus of Turin, and Theodoret, and the letters of Jerome and Augustine plainly shew that luxury and dissipation, with their usual concomitants of avarice and inordinate love of money-getting, were at this period the most flagrant vices of society—vices against which the teachers of the church were engaged in a continual struggle, though with very imperfect success.

(2) The rise of numerous sects and the absorbing attention given to controversial theology, which affected more directly the doctrinal teaching of the age. Ammianus describes the highways in the reign of Constantius as thronged by bishops urging their way to the different synods intent on "reducing the whole sect to their particular opinions" (bk. xxi. c. 16). Hilary of Poitiers, the distinguished opponent of the Arians, laments that there are "as many creeds as opinions among men, as many doctrines as inclinations, and as many sources of blasphemy as faults" (ad Constant. ii. 4; Migne, x. 545), and he affirms that the ten provinces of Asia are nearly all Arian (de Synodis, c. 63). Pacian declares that the simple enumeration of the different sects of Christianity at this time would suffice to fill a huge volume (Migne, xiii. 1053). When Julian essayed to establish the principle of religious equality in the relations of the state to these contending sects, their fierceness, says Ammianus, appeared to him to surpass that of the wild beasts towards man (bk. xxii. c. 5). Of the extent to which these disputes affected and stirred all classes of society, a good illustration is afforded in the thirty-second oration of Gregory of Nazianzum. He says elsewhere that the disputes generated by the Eunomians made the market places ring, disturbed every banquet, and penetrated even to the women's chambers (Orat. 27; Migne, Patrol. Graec. xxxvi. 488). Augustine deplores the fact that while the pagans worship many gods without quarrelling, Christians who worship but one God are unable to remain in unity (Serm. de Utilit. jejun. c. 7; Migne, xl. 712).

(3) Importance attached to formal religious observances. As the result of this excessive attention to obscure questions in theology, dogmatic belief began to be looked upon as of greater importance than virtuous conduct; while conduct itself was conceived in too mechanical a spirit—almsgiving, fasting, and praying at stated hours being the virtues most strongly insisted on (Baur, Die Christl. Kirche, ii. 289). Augustine expressly says that these are the most meritorious actions in this life (in Ps. 42; Serm. ix. 11). "Three things," says Leo the Great (Serm. xii. 4), "there are which most of all appertain to godly action—praying, fasting, and almsgiving."

Penance was imposed by the church for comparatively small offences, and the canons of numerous councils shew a tendency to enforce a discipline which, although perhaps productive of greater outward decorum, cannot but have exercised an enervating influence on the higher conceptions of morality.

(4) Enhanced distinctions between the monastic and ecclesiastical orders and the laity. Notwithstanding the many examples offered by monasticism in its earlier stages of self-denying virtue and saintly life, its influence on society at large was certainly of a somewhat mixed character, attracting admiration among the majority of a life which they were unable to imitate, and thus, as Gieseler observes, familiarising society with the notion of a "higher and a lower order of virtue" (Kirchengesch. vi. 104). It is again at least doubtful whether the greatly advanced conception of the priestly office that now began to prevail tended to raise the moral tone of society at large. The clergy were regarded as a class exclusively devoted to religious duties, whose works of supererogation might avail on behalf of others. Eusebius describes the clerical and lay elements as constituting the two great divisions of society, of which the former, seeking neither for marriage, nor children, nor wealth, is devoted to appeasing the Deity both on their own behalf and that of their fellow-Christians (Dem. Evang. i. 8; Migne, xxii. 29, 30). No humiliation or punishment was regarded by them with so much dread as that whereby they were degraded into the position of laymen (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iv. c. 1).

(5) Degeneracy of the clergy. Notwithstanding the increased attention paid to organization and to ritual, the morality of the clergy was exposed to no ordinary temptations by their growing power and wealth, and especially by the right which the church acquired under Constantine of holding landed property and inheriting it by bequest. The practice that now began to prevail of making the clergy the ordinary dispensers of charity, was also productive of frequent abuse. A law of Valentinian I. (Cod. Theod. XVI. ii. 27, 28) declares all bequests and donations to ecclesiastics null and void. "Charioteers, actors, and harlots," says Jerome, "yea even pagan priests, may receive what a Christian priest may not; I complain not on behalf of the church, but I blush for those who have made this law necessary" (Epist. 52; Migne, xxii. 261). Chrysostom advises his hearers to distribute their alms themselves, and not through the agency of a priest or deacon (Thierry, S. Jérôme, p. 17).

Other causes might be enumerated, but the foregoing may safely be assigned as those which appear to have operated with the greatest potency when tested by the social phenomena of the 4th and 5th centuries. The period A.D. 350–400 has indeed been indicated as that when the greatest luxury known in ancient times prevailed, and whatever may be the feature of society selected, it is impossible not to recognise, even among those communities which enjoyed the most enlightened spiritual instruction of the time and afforded the most eminent examples of the Christian virtues, the demoralising effects of this influence. In the 4th century, the ostentation and luxury that prevailed among the Christians excited the surprise even of the pagan party, and Chrysostom reminds his hearers how much more effective is practice than precept: "when they" (the pagans), he says, "see us building splendid palaces and baths, laying out gardens, and purchasing estates, they cannot believe that we are looking forward to dwelling in another city" (Hom. xii. in Matt.; Migne, Patrol. Graec. lvii. 208). The view that the frivolity and dissipation engendered by this excessive luxury are to be looked upon as mainly characteristic of those who, while giving a formal assent to Christianity, really retained the habits and tastes of paganism, is not altogether borne out by the facts. Zosimus (iv. 33) does not hesitate to accuse even Theodosius of culpable effeminacy; and the sons of Theodosius were conspicuous for the oriental splendour by which they were surrounded, and the gorgeous attire which attracted the admiration of the vulgar to their person (Müller, de Genio, etc. Aevi Theodos. p. 10). The language of Synesius at the court of Arcadius attests the existence of a moral degeneracy at the imperial court which the philosopher and the Christian alike condemned (Migne, Patrol. Graec. lxxvi. 1075–90). The governors of the provinces, Eutropius, Rufinus, and Andronicus, were as corrupt, as rapacious, and as cruel as Verres. Milman characterises the life of the aristocracy as "exhibiting the pomp and prodigality of a high state of civilization with none of its ennobling or humanizing effects" (Hist. of Christianity, bk. iv. c. 1). Ambrose describes the holders of high public offices as seeking to gain the popular favour by instituting games in the circus, performances in the theatre, and exhibiting gladiatorial combats (de Officiis Minist. ii. 21; Migne, xvi. 131). In another passage he says that the regard for wealth has taken such a hold of men that none but the rich are had in honour (ib. ii. 26; iii. 6). Asterius, bishop of Amasea in Pontus, remonstrates with his hearers on their abandonment of "all care for virtue and the welfare of their souls;" he describes them as devoting themselves entirely to the pursuit of gain and to lounging about the market places; he depicts the luxury of their banquets,—the attendants, wine-bearers, butlers, musicians, dancing girls, flute-players, buffoons (γελωτοποιούς), parasites,—and then asks, "How many poor are wronged in order to provide this luxury? How many orphans are maltreated (κοινυλίζονται)? How many widows made to weep?" (Migne, Patrol. Graec. xl. 170). Perhaps however the most sinister feature is that he declares that many seek to be well spoken of by slave-dealers. In his sermon on Dives and Lazarus, he describes the prevailing extravagance in dress—a feature almost invariably indicative of a low standard of public morality. Some wore into the material of their costume representations of wild animals and hunting scenes, which excited the wonder even of the children in the street, who would follow pointing at the wearers. The more pious selected subjects in sacred history, the miracles, &c. (ib. xl. 166–170).

The clergy shared in this form of degeneracy. Jerome describes the young deacons at Rome as appearing in public with their hair curled like that of actors, perfumed, and wearing rings on their fingers, going from palace to palace, and there singing love-songs or declaiming comedies, and leaving with their hands full of gold (Epist. 22; Migne, xxii. 112).

The amusements most in vogue exhibited the same tendencies. "Paganism," as Ozanam truly observes, "made its last stand as associated with these" (Civilisation in the Fifth Century, i. 89). Ammianus Marcellinus asserts of the lower orders that the Circus Maximus was at once "their temple, their dwelling, their place of assembly, and the centre of all their desires" (bk. xxviii. 4). Gambling was a vice especially prevalent, and tended materially to check all habits of thriftiness (Thierry, St. Jérôme, i. 4). At the council of Laodicea (A.D. 320) it was deemed necessary to enact that Christians attending marriage feasts ought neither to dance nor leap—βαλλίζειν ἢ ὀρχεῖσθαι (Mansi, Conc. ii. 574); the clergy are also directed to retire before the plays (θωαίαι) have commenced, a direction which evidently implies that such performances were common on such occasions among the laity.

As a consequence of this degeneracy, religious duties and the sacraments were neglected. Leo the Great (de Vocat. Gentium, ii. 33) says that even the rite of baptism was deferred by many until they found themselves in some great peril. Other observances, such as the "Agapæ" or feasts at the tombs of the martyrs, were degraded into occasions of shameful excess.

The widespread belief in magic (MAGIC), whether we look upon it as a relic of paganism (PAGANISM, SURVIVAL OF), or as fostered by new Oriental influences, shews how imperfect was the Christianity of the time. Augustine, on presenting to his congregation in church a "mathematicus" who had embraced Christianity and had come forward prepared to burn his books, implies that he had duped many Christians,—"Quam multis eum putatis Christianis nummos abstulisse?" (in Psal. lxi.; Migne, xxxvi. 748).

The laxity that pervaded married life is to be inferred from the fact that the restrictions placed by Constantine on divorce (Cod. Theod. III. xvi. 1) were almost abrogated under Honorius (ib. III. xvi. 2); and Asterius declares that men changed their wives as often as their clothes, and prepared fresh marriage chambers as readily as booths at a fair (Migne, Patr. Græc. xl. 227).

Zosimus (iv. 28, 33) supports the severest strictures of the Fathers, declaring that the corruptions of the court penetrated through every grade of society, and that all order and decency were disregarded in the gratification of appetite and indolence—a condition of society which, in the view of Gibbon (iii. 404) resulted, not from the overflowing prosperity of the empire, but from "that indolent despair which enjoys the present hour, and declines the thought of futurity." If indeed we note that the writers above quoted,—from Ammianus, who died towards the close of the 4th century, to Leo who died in 461,—represent both pagan and Christian opinion, and also depict society as it existed in the most important provinces both of the Eastern and the Western empire, the "discretion" which Milman recommends in estimating the morality of the times from the writings of the Fathers, will not prevent us from concluding that the impression conveyed is, on the whole, correct; nor can it be a matter for surprise that many Christians should have sought to escape from the influence of so much general corruption by retiring into almost complete seclusion from society. The lives of St. Basil and his mother and sister at Annesi, of Asella, and of Marcella at her mansion in the suburbs of Rome, described by Jerome (Epist. 24, 38; Migne, xxii. 129, 175), that of Jerome himself, that of Paulinus at Nola, may all be looked upon as indications of a growing sentiment which found more formal expression in monasticism.

Yet notwithstanding the evidence everywhere presented of a great decline from the standard of Christian practice in earlier times, there yet appears sufficient evidence to warrant us in ascribing to Christianity the influences which mainly averted the entire demoralisation of society, and ultimately brought about its reorganisation. Features are still to be discerned which contrast favourably with the best morality of pagan communities in any age. Infanticide and the exposure of offspring continued to be persistently denounced, and were to a great extent successfully repressed by the church (Chrysostom, in illud: Filius ex se nihil facit, Hom. 4). The dignity of labour began to be in some degree recognised, and industry to be associated with freedom (Wallon, Hist. de l'Esclavage, iii. 92; Guizot, Hist. de la Civilisat. i. 52). Chrysostom declares that laborious poverty is preferable to indolent wealth (in I. Cor. Hom. xxiv. 5). The rights and social position of women continued to be respected, and were carefully protected by the legislator (WOMEN).

The principle of universal benevolence was more systematically recognised, and Ambrose (de Offic. Minist. iii. 7) denounces the traditional custom of expelling aliens from the city when famine appeared to be impending. Asterius, while censuring the selfish luxury of the age, affirms that the man who can look upon others suffering from hunger or disease without being moved gives the lie to his human nature (Migne, Patrol. Græc. xl. 171). The letters of Theodoret relating to Celestiacus, a wealthy citizen of Carthage, who had been compelled to flee from that city on its capture by the Vandals in 439, with the loss of all his possessions, afford a picture in pleasing relief to these times. Celestiacus had been eminent both for his virtues and for his hospitality, and Theodoret (at that time bishop of Cyrhus) describes the Christian fortitude with which he bears his heavy misfortune, and in a series of letters of introduction recommends him to the sympathy of Domnus, bishop of Antioch, and other of the chief men of that city (Migne, Patrol. Græc. lxxxiii. 1090–1096).

It is, in fact, in the virtues and abilities of the eminent men who at this period adorned the episcopate, that we recognise the element to which society owed its preservation, and round which it was, to a great extent, subsequently reorganized. "The bishop," says Gibbon (iv. 36), "was the perpetual censor of the morals of his people." "The religious heads of the communities," says Milman (bk. iv. c. 1), "were the supreme and universally recognised arbiters in all the transactions of life." As church discipline acquired greater definiteness, from the enactments of numerous councils, the episcopal influence made itself more effectively felt. The bishop often confronted the civil power with a courage and authority to which the latter found it expedient to yield. Ambrose at Milan, Gregory at Nazianzum, Synesius at Ptolemais, Deogratias at Carthage, Leo and Gregory the Great at Rome, are instances which may be considerably multiplied at this period.

In proportion to the social and political authority of the bishop was the influence which he exerted as a teacher of morality, and the teaching of these centuries was often singularly enlightened and humane. No more judicious and effective rebukes of superstition can well be cited, than are to be found in the sermons of Maximus of Turin (PAGANISM, SURVIVAL OF). The arguments by which Asterius of Amasea enforces the advantages of temperance and occasional abstinence might command the assent of the most enlightened modern social reformer (Migne, Patrol. Graec. xl. 371-4). Synesius, "in whose hands," says Milman (Hist. of Christianity, bk. iv. c. 1), "the power of the Christian bishop appears under its noblest and most beneficial form," repudiated the theory of the celibacy of the clergy. The most eminent of the Eastern clergy (in contrast to the narrow view that prevailed in the Latin church) encouraged the study of pagan literature (SCHOOLS). Even Gregory of Tours, though singularly prone to superstition and credulity, defended the principle of religious toleration. Of society, as presented to us under the influence of these more humane and liberal conceptions yet free from the deeper corruptions of the empire, we gain a glimpse in the pages of Sidonius Apollinaris, where he describes the ordinary life of the nobility of southern Gaul, with whom the bishops of the province associated on equal terms. The day commenced with attending service in the church; then early visits were paid to neighbours, from which it was customary to return before ten o'clock in the morning: the remainder of the morning was spent in playing tennis or in reading Latin authors in the library. Here the ladies were supposed to occupy themselves only with religious works, the profane writers being reserved for the men. Then followed the use of the bath, after which dinner was served (Epist. ii. 9).

It is probable that a full and satisfactory investigation of our subject at this period would render it necessary to distinguish the phenomena of Eastern and Western civilisation. In the opinion of some writers, the earlier and more complete acceptance of Christianity in the East served as an element of cohesion among the different ranks of society, which, notwithstanding the fierceness of theological controversy, enabled the Byzantine empire to oppose a successful resistance to successive shocks of barbaric invasion such as those to which the Western empire succumbed. The traditional theory, that "the example of the Byzantine empire has proved on a vast scale and in the most indisputable manner that Christianity could act only mediately and indirectly on social life, that it might receive the assent of an entire nation and yet not save it from decrepitude and death" (Flint, Philosophy of History, i. 54) is accordingly not unchallenged. "The popular element in the social organisation of the Greek people," says Mr. Finlay, "by its alliance with Christianity, infused into society the energy which saved the Eastern empire; the disunion of the Pagans and Christians, and the disorder in the administration flowing from this disunion, ruined the Western" (Hist. of Greece, ed. Tozer, i. 138).

(III.) "As Christianity," says Milman, "received the rude and ignorant barbarians within its pale, the general effect could not but be that the age would drag down the religion to its level, rather than the religion elevate the age to its own lofty standard" (Hist. of Christianity, bk. iv. c. 5). The features of society in the Teutonic communities, after their conversion, attest the truth of this observation. It is agreed by the majority of the most competent writers that the standard of morality in these communities, when compared with that of the Latin races, exhibits yet a further decline, and that if we are presented with fewer evidences of vice there was a larger amount of brutality and violence. The barbarian conquerors and the subjugated Latin communities reciprocally influenced each other, but this influence was, in the first instance, for the most part unfavourable. The latter were still further demoralized by their subject condition (Jerome, Epist. 89; Salvian, de Gub. Dei, vii. 5-10), the former by the licence in which they could indulge without check. De Broglie (l'Eglise et l'Empire, III. ii. 497) characterises the conquest as "la mise à sac d'une société tout entière par des hordes qu'aucun lien social ne contient." The fearful state of society in Frankland under the Merovingian dynasty, as described by Gregory of Tours, is familiar to most students of history. Ozanam (Civilis. chez les Francs, p. 311) quotes from the Libellus de Ecclesiae Disciplinis compiled by Regino, abbat of Prüm in the 9th century, the questions which the priest is there directed to put to an ordinary warrior in the confessional—a category which implies that crimes of violence and the grossest superstition were still fearfully prevalent. The aversion of the conquerors to city life enhanced the difficulty of bringing them within the influence of Christian teaching. The clergy, whose duty it was to convert, instruct, and humanise the conqueror, themselves shared in the general corruption. "From the moment that the barbarians became masters in the West, an immense deterioration becomes manifest in the clergy, in their teaching, in their standard of conduct Even from men like Prosper of Aquitaine, Avitus of Vienne, Caesarius of Arles, the descent is great to the next generation in the 6th century, with their coarse and superficial religion, their readiness to allow sin to buy itself off by prodigal gifts, the connivance by the best men at imposture, its direct encouragement by the average" (Church, Beginning of the Middle Ages, p. 49). The episcopal order, indeed, lost for a time, much of its sacred character. The bishop was often a warrior, and differed but little in his habits of life from an ordinary baron; while the work of evangelisation and the preservation of the scanty learning of the time devolved almost entirely on the monastic orders. Slavery reappeared in its harshest form, and, in spite of the efforts of the clergy, continued long after the 9th century to disgrace the Christianity of the age (SLAVERY).

In fine, it would seem that society, if we interpret the term in its strict sense, can scarcely be said to have existed in Italy, Gaul, or Britain during the period that immediately succeeded the conquests by the Lombard, the Frank, and the Saxon. In its place we can discern only a state of disorganisation wherein the obligations and restraints imposed by the most rudimentary form of civilisation nearly altogether disappeared. This condition of things was gradually, and often with the intervention of an almost complete relapse, succeeded by one which exhibits the reorganisation of society mainly under ecclesiastical influences, and the establishment of institutions, national, social, and domestic, which reflect a combined tradition of Roman law and Christian doctrine.

SOLDIERS. [MILITARY SERVICE.]

SOLEAS. A term in Eastern church architecture, as to the meaning and derivation of which there has been great diversity of opinion. The orthography of the word is also very variable. We find σωλέας, σωλέα, σωλία, σωλέα, σολέα. The difficulty in determining the reference of the word was recognised by Goar, who attributes it to the arrangement having almost passed out of use, and remarks, "in ecclesiis Graecis ubique nomen habet, in rarissimis conspicitur" (Goar, Eucholog. 18). Allatius, as is his wont, pours forth a mass of learning on the subject, and comes to strangely erroneous conclusions in the end. At one time he agrees with Meursius and Beveridge (Pandect. vol. ii. annot. p. 74) in regarding the word as synonymous with "solum," a throne (de Templ. Graec. Recent. ep. ii.); but in his Dissertation de Solea he identifies it with the "tabulatum" or "iconostasis." An examination of the passages in which the word occurs proves the erroneous-ness of both. It is true that the word is not always strictly used, and sometimes has a wider signification than at others; but there can be no doubt that the "soleas" was a division of the church, not a piece of church furniture; and there can be as little question that Neale is right in deciding it to be the raised platform intervening between the "trapeza" or nave, and the "bema" or sanctuary, ascended from the nave by one or more steps. It was outside the "cancelli" or "iconostasis" of the "bema," and was approached from the sanctuary through the "holy doors." The "beautiful doors," which are placed by Neale further down the nave, were to the (ritual) west of the "soleas," and the "ambo" stood near it. It corresponded to the chancel-rail step in our churches, being the place where the communicants knelt to receive the Eucharist. At ordinations, according to Goar (u.s.), the ordinand, whether deacon or priest, took his place on the "solea," and two deacons came out from the "bema" and conducted him, on either side, up to the holy doors. At a later period the "solea" seems to have gained extension to the west, and became the place for the subdeacons and readers, and was called βῆμα τῶν ἀναγνοστών. It is correctly defined by Gretser (Annotat. ad Codin. pp. 360-361, ed. Bonn) as "gradus vel locus excelsior ad sacras βήματος fores positus, ex quo Christus pro Christiana communione distribuitur." Its true position and character appear from various passages in Codinus, who describes the emperor descending from the "ambo," and passing alone across the "soleas," "not the way he came towards the beautiful doors," but towards the "soleas" and "bema," and finding the patriarch standing to receive him at the "holy doors" (Codin. Curopal. c. 17, pp. 91, 94; also p. 361). In the more stately churches the "solea" was inlaid with costly marbles, ornamented with plates of silver, and decorated with images. When the dome of St. Sophia fell, it broke to pieces τοὺς σωλείας ἐξ οὐχίτου ὄντας λίθου; and on the restoration by Justin II., both it and the ambo were made of silver (Codin. Annotat. p. 361; Allat. de Solea, c. xi.). [E. V.]

SOLITARIES. For some account of the impulses which led men to seek solitude in the wilderness, see HERMIT, MONASTERY. It may be added that solitaries before long began to cluster round great and populous cities. [Compare SARABAITAE.] Partly perhaps they were influenced by actual experience of the spiritual horrors of loneliness, partly by a wish to mingle in the theological fray between orthodox and heretics, partly perhaps by a longing to have their hardships noticed and honoured by men. Sometimes the cell of the solitary was semi-attached to a monastery (Theodoret, Hist. Relig. c. 3). Sometimes the solitary cell was only a temporary shelter, a retreat in which to take breath, as it were, for a moment before engaging again in the battle of life. It was ever the advice of the wisest leaders of the monastic movement that there should be a certain period of probation in a monastery before undertaking the life of a solitary, and that none should be allowed to expose themselves to the risks of it without the express sanction of their monastic superiors (Cass. Collat. Praef. xviii.). As the monastic system became more firmly consolidated, and at the same time more complex in its organisation, the solitary life, especially in Western Christendom, came to be more and more exceptional in its occurrence (Conc. Toletan. vii. A.D. 646, c. 5; Conc. Francof. A.D. 794, c. 12).

SOMNIARIUS, Somniatorum Conjector, ὄνειροκρίτης, ὄνειρομαντὴς, ὄνειρόπολος. A law of Constantius and Julian, A.D. 358, denounces those who "narrandis somniis occultant artem aliquam divinandi" (Theodos. Codex, x. 16, De Malef. 6). The offence was equally forbidden in the empire founded by Charlemagne (Capit. inc. an. c. 40; Baluz. Cap. Reg. Franc. i. 518; comp. the complete code, vi. 215; Herardi, Capit. 3). The council of Paris, A.D. 829, regarded the practices of the "somniaiorum conjectores" as a relic of paganism (iii. 2; comp. Add. ii. to the Cap. Reg. Franc. c. 21). [W. E. S.]

SONUS, or rather, corruptly, sonum. The OFFERTORIUM of the Franks was so called, e. g. "Sonum quod canetur (sic) . . . quando procedit oblatio" (German. Paris. Expos. Brev. Miss.). The name is said (Germ. u. s.; comp. Isid. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. i. 14; Amal. de Eccl. Off. iii. 19) to have been given to the anthem, because sung in imitation of the sounding of trumpets over sacrifices under the law (Num. x. 10).

Among the Goths of Spain the proper anthem at lauds and vespers on festivals was also called sonum. E. g. the council of Merida, 666, orders that on such days "post lumen oblatum (= lucernarium) prius dicatur vespertinum quam sonum" (can. 2). This sonum was sometimes called laudes; for whereas the Mozarabic breviary directs that it shall follow vespers immediately, Isidore says that the lucernarium was followed by "two psalms, one responsory and laudes" (Regul. Monach. 6). The following is the sonum, or in the yet lower Latin of the Hispano-Gothic breviary, the "sono," for Easter day: "ego dormivi et quievi, et resurrexi, quoniam Dominus suscitavit me. P. Gloria mea. Alleluia. V. Non timebo millia populi mei circumdantis me: exurge, Domine; salva me, Deus meus. P. Gloria mea. Alleluia" (Brev. Goth. Lorenzana, 370). [W. E. S.]

SORTILEGY. It was held that "demons rule lots" (Cypr. de Idol. Vanit.; comp. Minut. Fel. Octav. 8; Greg. M. Epist. vii. 66). Hence divination by lots was thought a part of magic and a branch of idolatry. It was therefore forbidden to Christians both in the East and West; as by Conc. Ancyran. 358 (can. 23), C. Venet. in Gallia, 465 (c. 16), C. Agath. 506 (c. 42), Aurel. I. 511 (c. 30), Autiss. 518 (c. 4), &c. It was a subject of inquiry at episcopal visitation (Regino, de Discipul. Eccl. 151, ed. Baluz.), and at confession (see the old Gallican penitential, c. 26, in Mus. Ital. i. 393, and others in Morinus, de Sacram. Poenit. 587, &c.). It was condemned by Christian princes; as by Childeric, 742 (c. 5), Carloman, 742 (c. 14), Car. M. 769; id. 789 (c. 23), Capit. Reg. Franc. vi. 215, vii. 128. Under the Frankish laws sortilegi were not received as witnesses (Capit. Reg. Franc. vi. 397, vii. 369).

The methods were various, "sortes quas sanctorum vocant (comp. Conc. Agath. Venet. Aurel. u. s.; Bede, de Remed. Peccat. c. 11), vel quas de ligno, aut de pane faciunt" (Conc. Autiss. u. s.). Divination "per sortes sanctorum" was a Christian counterpart of the sortes Virgilianae, &c. An augury was drawn from, or a conclusion founded on, the first passage at which some sacred book (as the psalter or gospel, Car. M. an. 789, c. 3; the lectionary, Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 16; the sacramentary, Jonas Aurel. in Vita S. Huberti, c. 15, in Baluz. Not. ad Cap. Reg. Fr. ii. 1038; &c.) first opened at hazard. This is condemned by St. Augustine as an abuse of the divine oracles, though he had rather men had such recourse to the gospels than to demons (Ep. 55 ad Januar. xx. 37). The Gallican Penitential, u. s. punished even this when "contrarationem." See instances of the practice in Greg. Tur. or Jonas, u. s.; Vita S. Consortiae 9, in Acta Bened. i. 249; Vita S. Huberti, 18; Acta Ben. iv. i. 302. An unsought omen from a Psalm ended the opposition to the choice of St. Martin as bishop of Tours (Sulpicius Sever. de Vita B. Mart. 9).

There is extant, under the title of Sortes Apostolorum, a collection of pious sentences, but not from the apostolical writings, so framed as to give suitable, though vague, replies to every probable inquiry. They were printed by Petr. Pitheous in his Codex Canonum Vet. Eccl. Rom. Par. 1687, p. 370. A fast of three days on bread and water is prescribed before using them. On the third day the office of the Holy Trinity is to be recited and Mass heard. Special prayers are also provided. At the end we read, "Haec sunt Sortes Sanctorum quae nunquam falluntur, neque mentiuntur; id est, Deum roga et obtinebis quod cupis. Age Ei gratias."

Many tribes retained a custom observed by their heathen ancestors (see of the Suessones, Vita Anskari, 18, 26, 30, Pertz, ii. 701; of the Saxons, Transl. S. Alex. 2, ib. 675; of the Frisones, Wulfami Vita, 6, 8, in Acta Bened. iii. i. 359, 361; Vita Willibrordi, 11 ("sors damnatorium"), ib. 609; comp. Willebrordi Vita, 3, Pertz, ii. 381) of deciding questions of guilt or innocence, life or death, by lot. This was sanctioned by Christian princes; e. g. of a slave accused of theft, "ad sortem ponatur" (Childebert, 593, c. 5). The Lex Frisionum describes a method (comp. Tacitus, Germania, 10). Two tallies, one marked with a cross, were wrapped in white wool, and laid on the altar. If that marked was drawn, the person was acquitted. Some kinds of ordeal, as governed by chance, were included under the term sors. Hence, "ad sortem ambulare" (Childeb. u. s. 8). Dagobert, 630: "Ad ignem seu ad sortem se excusare studeat" (Lex Ripuar. xxxi. 5; Reg. Franc. Cap. Baluz. i. 34). Leo IV. charges the Bretons with settling every cause by lot: "Sortes quibus cuncta vos in vestris discriminatis judiciis" (Ep. ii. 4). [W. E. S.]

SOTER (SOTHER), Feb. 10, virgin, martyr in the East (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker., Wand.); her natale is given on this day in the Gelasian Sacramentary, which names her in the collect, secreta, and post-communion. She or another of the same name, a martyr under Diocletian, is mentioned by Notker under May 12. [C. H.]

SOUL, SYMBOLS OF THE. The following symbols were used by Christians in the first centuries to denote the deliverance of the soul from the fetters of the flesh and its approach to heaven: (1) a horse running a race and near the goal, derived no doubt from 1 Cor. ix. 24, and perhaps from 2 Tim. iv. 7; (2) a ship in full sail towards a lighthouse, or already arrived at port; (3) a sheep or a lamb, sometimes by itself, sometimes borne back to the fold in the arms of the Good Shepherd; (4) a dove, sometimes on the wing, sometimes seated near an empty vase—a symbol of the body deserted by the spirit—or again settling in a flower-garden, to signify the repose of the soul in Paradise; (5) a female figure quitting a lifeless corpse; (6) by a miniature figure resembling, and close by, the representation of the dead. A curious instance of the use of the female figure occurs on a leaden medallion figured by Lupi (Dissert. i. 197), representing the martyrdom of St. Lawrence [MONEY, pl. viii.]. An executioner is turning the body of the saint upon the gridiron, and a half-length female figure is rising from it with hands clasped towards heaven, from which a hand is extended, placing upon her head a crown of gold.

It is possible that the female figures in prayer or contemplation between two trees, found on so many tombs, may also be symbolic representations of the soul (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chret. s. v. 'Ame'). [E. C. H.]

SPANOCLISTUS. A corrupt form of the Greek επανόκληστος, a term applied to chalices, patens, chandeliers, &c., closed-in at the top. The word occurs frequently in Anastasius. There we read that Leo III. gave to St. Peter's "calicem aureum praecipuum spanoclistum diversis ornatum lapidibus," together with "patenam auream spanoclistam" (Anast. § 399). The same pope also gave "gabathae spanoclistae" to hang for the purpose of giving light in the "quadriporticus" or cloister (§ 418); and a "regnum spanoclistum" of gold with a cross depending from it to hang over the altar (§ 398). Paschal I. also presented to the church of St. Praxedas a gold and jewelled "regnum spanoclistum" to light the altar (§ 435). [CROWN; CORONA LUCIS; GABATHA.] [E. V.]

SPIRITS, EVIL. [DEMON; DEMONIAIC; EXORCISM.]

tualia) it is convenient to enumerate the principal practices which are believed to contribute to the exaltation of the spiritual life.

1. First among these we may reckon Reading, and especially the reading of the Bible [SCRIPTURE, STUDY OF], both in public and in private. To this soon came to be added works compiled with a special view to edification, such as the Acts of Martyrs, the Collationes of John Cassian, and the lives and miracles of famous men collected by Rufinus, Theodoret, Joannes Moschus, Gregory of Tours, and others. Forgeries in this field of literature soon came to be frequent, and many Christians had an inclination for the pagan literature which the more ascetic leaders condemned; circumstances which led to certain books being marked off by authority as unfit for the reading of Christian people [PROHIBITED BOOKS; SCHOOLS].

2. The Psalms in particular have always had a special prominence among the books used for spiritual exercise [PSALMODY]. The fathers constantly recommend the learning and the saying of psalms as an exercise of the highest efficacy. (See, for instance, Jerome, Epist. 107, ad Laetam, c. 4; Epist. 125 ad Rustic. c. 11; Epist. 108 ad Eustoch. c. 19.) And the psalms—however long a portion might be said—were commonly recited standing, unless in case of some grievous infirmity (Theodoret, Hist. Relig. cc. 2 and 5; Moschus, Pratum Spirituale, c. 40; Basil, Epist. 63 ad Neocaesarenses, &c.). With psalmody is intimately connected the observance of VIGILS, especially in monasteries [HOURS OF PRAYER, p. 795]. A whole class of monks, the "Sleepless" [ACOEMETAE], devoted themselves to keeping up the Divine office [OFFICE, THE DIVINE] without intermission.

3. PRAYER and PROCESSIONS, LITANIES, ROGATIONS, STATIONS, and PILGRIMAGES, which are reckoned among spiritual exercises, are treated under their proper headings.

4. The Confession of sin, both to the Lord (Ps. xxxii. 6; 1 John i. 8, 9), and to the brethren (James v. 16), is reckoned among the exercises which tend to edification. Nothing, says an old father of the desert (Rufinus, Vitae Patrum, ii. 9), so weakens the power of Satan as to disclose our unclean thoughts to holy men and spiritual fathers. And nothing, says another (ib. 117), more rejoices the enemy of souls than the concealment of such thoughts in the breast. Hence in monastic orders, both of earlier and later times, a reciprocal confession of sins is enjoined on the brethren. See, for instance, Regula Columbani, c. 10, and the Regula Cujusdam, c. 6 (in Holstenius, i. 397); the latter is supposed by Holstenius to be Columba's. This kind of confession is distinct from the auricular confession which is followed by sacramental absolution.

5. That the Holy Communion holds a high place among the means of grace needs scarcely to be said. On the frequency of communion, see COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 421. It may further be observed that in the early African Church the brethren were so anxious to sanctify every meal by first partaking of the Eucharist, that the consecrated elements were taken home for that purpose (Tertullian ad Uxorem, ii. 5; De Orat. 19; Cyprian, de Lapsis, ii. 26. See also ARCA, RESERVATION). Hippolytus wrote a treatise, which was known to Jerome (Epist.

71 ad Lucin. c. 6), on the question whether we ought to communicate daily or at set times. We may see from the laments of Chrysostom and others that ordinary lay persons communicated less frequently than was desired, but with specially devout men it was otherwise. The old monk Apollo, for instance, communicated daily, and taught his disciples not to eat until they had received the Eucharist (Palladius, Hist. Laus. c. 52, pp. 750, 751).

6. Self-Examination (sometimes called Recollection) is a recognised duty of Christians (2 Cor. xiii. 5), especially before Holy Communion (1 Cor. xi. 28); but self-examination as a systematic practice, regulated by definite rules and recurring at certain times, is the development of a later age. Clement of Alexandria, in the directions for Christian life which form the Paedagogus, though he quotes the Pythagorean precept, that a man should examine himself every day, does not hold it up as necessary for the Christian (Paedag. i. 10), and Macarius in his special treatise on "the Guarding of the Heart," while he insists strongly on the necessity of withdrawing into oneself and of constant self-watchfulness, nowhere recommends any methodical practice of this exercise (περὶ φυλακῆς καρδίας, c. 1; but compare Athanasius, Vita S. Antonii, c. 28). Cassian (Collat. v. 14) advises every man to direct his principal efforts against the sin which most easily besets him, but gives no directions for self-examination such as prevailed in later times. Nor do Chrysostom's strong recommendations of watchfulness over oneself (Hom. 73 ad Pop. Antioch.; Hom. 82 in Joann.) imply any definite rules for examination of conscience. Such rules, in fact, scarcely belong to an age earlier than that of St. Bernard and the mediaeval mystics.

7. Meditation or Contemplation, the effort to withdraw the soul from the world of sense, and fix it on God and things divine, plays a very important part in the lives of mediaeval and modern mystics. But in this case also the development of the system does not belong to the ancient Church, though we frequently find in ancient worthies—especially in the ancient hermits or "Fathers of the Desert"—an immense power of withdrawal from the outer world, generally coupled with the faculty of seeing visions of things unearthly. One particular form of contemplation—the contemplation of death—is found from a period of considerable antiquity. Several of the Eastern ascetics, after the example of Anthony, dug their graves near the caves which they inhabited, or lived in tombs, so as to be always reminded of their latter end (Palladius, Lausiaca, cc. 5, 45, 109, 113; Theodoret, Hist. Relig. cc. 6, 9, 12). John the Almsgiver, patriarch of Alexandria (†616), had his grave and coffin partly prepared, and bade the workman inquire aloud, on every high festival, whether he should not finish the work, as he knew not when his Lord would come (Leontius Neapol. Vita S. Joann. Eleemos. c. 18). The abbess Caesaria of Arles, sister of the famous bishop Caesarius (†542), had a hundred stone coffins made for her hundred nuns, which were placed around the church, that they might daily be reminded of death. And other instances might be mentioned of similar practices.

8. Silence of course accompanies meditation. Pambos, the monk, we read (Socrates, H. E. iv.

23, p. 238) was so struck by the first verse of the 39th Psalm—"I said, I will take heed to my ways, that I offend not in my tongue"—that he would hear no more, and said that in many years he had not learned to practise it. Monks came to be named ἡσυχασταί and their dwellings ἡσυχαστήρια, from their habit of silence [HESYCHASTAE]. Macarius kept silence a whole Lent (Lausiaca, c. 20, p. 723); Arsenius rushed from the tumult of the court-life of Constantinople to learn to practise silence in the desert (Rufinus, ii. 190). The monks of Tabennae kept so profound a silence that they seemed to be in solitude (Lausiaca, 48); the Nitrian monks appear to have kept silence, each in his separate cell, except when they met at the church on the Sabbath and the Lord's Day (ib. 69). The abbat Thomas kept silence for thirty years (ib. 50; Rufinus, ii. 6), an unnamed virgin (Lausiaca, 85) for twenty-five; John the Silentiary for forty-seven (Cyrillus, Vita Jo. Sil. c. 23; in Surius, v. 399). Pachomius taught his monks to indicate their wants by signs, so as to avoid talking (Pachomii Reg. c. 3, in Holstenius, i. 27). The Benedictine Rule, and most other monastic rules following it, enjoin absolute silence in a monastery after Compline, and also at table, except so far as regards the reading of an edifying book (Reg. Benedicti, cc. 38, 42, 52; Fructuosi, cc. 8, 15; Columbani, c. 8; Magistri, c. 8). (Alteserrae Asceicon; Zückler, Kritische Geschichte der Askese.) [C.]

SPOLIA. [VACANCY.]

SPONGE. The sponge used in the Greek liturgical ritual is known as ἅγιος σπόγγος, or μούσα, spongia sacra, or purificatorium. Its present form, which has probably come down with little change from earlier times, is described by Allatius (de Rec. Graec. Templ. p. 149) as a piece of sponge compressed into a solid cube, affixed to a long handle. It was used in the office of prothesis to collect the small crumbs of the bread on the paten, that none might fall off (Office of Prothesis, Neale, H. East. Ch. Intro. 349), and in the Eucharistic office was repeatedly employed by the deacon to cleanse the paten and chalice (Goar, Eucholog. Lit. Chrysost. pp. 76, 151), and after the reception any remaining fragments were swept by it into the chalice, and both that and the paten cleansed. For this purpose the holy veil was also employed, μετὰ τὴν μετέληψιν σπογγίζει τὸ καλύμματι τὸ ἅγιον ποτήριον . . . τότε λαβὼν τὸν ἅγιον δίσκον ὁ διάκονος ἐπάνω τοῦ ἁγίου ποτηρίου ἀποσπογγίζει τὸ ἅγιον σπόγγῳ πάνυ καλῶς (Liturg. S. Chrysost.; Goar, Euchol. p. 83). The sacred virtue of the Eucharist was regarded as being imparted to the sponge, which according to Goar (u. s.) was distributed by the patriarch among the people. It is similarly recorded in the memoir of Gregory II. by Anastasius (§ 182) that Eudo of Aquitaine, when about to encounter the Saracens, distributed portions of a sponge "ad usum mensae pontificis," which saved all who received them from wounds and death. A liturgical sponge of larger size was also kept for the ritual washing of the Holy Table by the patriarch on Maundy Thursday (Typ. S. Sabae, c. 41; Euchol. p. 624). (Allat. de Ecc. Graec. Temp. Epist. 1, de Mus.) [E. V.]

SPONSALIA. [MARRIAGE.]

CHRIST. ANT.—VOL. II.

SPONSORS (ἀνάδοχοι; οἱ προσφέροντες; παιδαγωγοί; κατηχημένοι; χειραγωγοί [of adults]; οἱ ἀποταττόμενοι, συνταττόμενοι; sponsors; fidejussores; fidei doctores, al. fidedoctores; susceptores; compadres spirituales, even parentes; offerentes. The occurrence and meaning of several of these titles will appear below).

HISTORY.—Though analogies and justification for the institution of sponsors may be found in the Bible, yet there is no mention of the word or thing. And though Fuller (Worthies of England, p. 326) says "that the Jews had a custom, at the circumcising of their children, that certain undertakers should make a solemn stipulation for their pious education, conformable to our godfathers in baptism," it is doubtful whether these were anything more than witnesses of the ceremony. We may adopt the argument of Tertullian (de Cor. Mil. 3), "If no scripture hath determined this, assuredly custom hath confirmed it, which doubtless has been derived from tradition. Other observances, without any Scripture document, we defend on the ground of tradition alone, and by the supports of consequent custom. In fact, to begin with baptism, when we are about to come to the water, in the same place, but at a somewhat earlier time (i.e. as catechumens), we do in the church testify, under the hand of a chief minister, that we renounce the devil, his pomps, and his angels. Then are we thrice dipped, pledging ourselves to something more than the Lord hath prescribed in the Gospel; then, some undertaking the charge of us (suscepti, i.e. by the susceptores, lit. those who take the candidates out of the font, or god-parents), we first taste a mixture of honey and milk." The origin of sponsorship is lost in obscurity, for though some (e.g. Durandus, de Rit. Ecc. i. 19) make Hyginus, bishop of Rome, A.D. 138–141, to be the first authority for it, the necessity for its introduction is rather to be referred to the general circumstances of those times. The frequent persecutions during those early ages brought with them a twofold peril, the probability of the violent death of Christian parents, and the possibility of the lapse into paganism of the baptized. Hence arose a twofold necessity on the part of the church of obtaining a security, independent of the parents, that the baptized infants should be brought up in the faith of the church in case of their parents' death or apostasy, and that the real character of adults seeking baptism should be answered for by other than themselves, to guard against the like spiritual calamity. We know that the risk of post-baptismal sin and fall led many of the severer school of Christian thought to advise and practise postponement of baptism, e.g. Tertullian, who uses the following argument, which incidentally bears witness to the sponsorial office as an established institution in the church. "The delaying of baptism is more profitable, according to the condition, or disposition, and moreover the age of each person, but especially in the case of children. For why is it necessary, if the thing be not so necessary, that the sponsors (sponsores) also be brought into danger? for both they themselves may, from their mortal nature, fail of their promises, and they may be disappointed by the growing up of a bad disposition" (de Baptism. c. 18). The more charitable and trustful course was that indicated in the Respons. ad Orthod., attributed to Justin Martyr, ὅς, ᾿Αξιούνται τῶν διὰ τοῦ βαπτίσματος ἀγαθῶν τὰ βρέφη τῇ πίστει τῶν προσφερόντων αὐτὰ τῷ βαπτίσματι. And so the author under the name of Dionys. Areop. (de Ecc. Hierarch. cap. vii. ad fin.), "It appeared good to receive infants in this way, that the natural parents of the child offered should hand the boy over to one of the faithful, a good teacher of divine things, under whom, as under a divine father (godfather), and a pupil in sacred saving truth, the boy should be. On this man then promising that he will educate the child in holy living, the priest enjoins that he promise the renunciations and confess the faith. Mark, he does not say, I do this instead of the child, but so the child does, i.e. I promise that I will train up the child by my sedulous exhortations, so that when he grows to years of discretion he will renounce."

The rationale of the office for adults is thus given by the same writer (de Ecc. Hierarch. cap. ii. par. 2): "He that is inflamed with desire of obtaining the heavenly gift (in baptism) goes to some one of the number of the faithful, and prays him to take him to the priest, promising that he will thoroughly follow all that is delivered to him; and he prays that he will both bring him, and that he will undertake the care of regulating the rest of his life for him. The other (with deep sense of his responsibility, &c.) most kindly promises to do what he asks, and, taking the man, brings him to the priest, who with joy proceeds, &c. [At a later stage of the proceedings] he orders the man and his susceptor to be described and the names written down. One of the ministers calls aloud to each, and then leads him into the water," &c.

That these sponsors were provided in a great measure to afford guarantees for the character of the catechumen is plain from the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. viii. c. 32), "Let those who first come to the holy mystery be led by the deacon to the bishop or to the presbyters, and let them examine into the reasons wherefore they are come to the word of the Lord. And let those who bring them bear witness unto them, knowing accurately what concerns them. And let their manner and life be examined into." The rest of the chapter deals with this examination in detail. For the same ends it was customary for deacons and deaconesses to undertake the office. In the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. iii. 16) it is prescribed, "Let a deacon receive (i.e. as sponsor, for baptism) a man, a deaconess a woman, that the grant of the irrefragable seal may be made with seemly security." Instances are given by Cotelierus in his note, from the Life of St. Epiphanius: "Lucian was the father (i.e. the godfather) of Epiphanius in holy baptism; and Bernice, a holy virgin, had been the (god) mother of the sister of Epiphanius." Victor of Utica (de Persec. Vandul.) says, "A deacon stood for (suscepit) each one." (See also Bingham, bk. xi. cap. viii. § 7.)

Hence also the great care which the early church used in the selection of persons (other than deacons) to undertake the office of sponsors. The ancients excluded all catechumens, energumens, heretics, and penitents, that is, all persons who were never yet in full communion with the church, as being themselves unbaptized; or else, such as had forfeited the privileges of their baptism by their errors, or crimes, or incapacity. By some canons persons who were never confirmed were also excluded. At a council held at Auxerre, A.D. 578, monks and nuns were forbidden to act in this capacity (see Bingham, bk. xi. cap. 8, § 10). It does not appear that wives stood with their husbands in any case. Elias, metropolitan of Crete (A.D. 732), answering the monk Dionysius (lib. iii. juris Oriental.) speaks strongly on the grave duties of sponsors.

The fourth Council of Carthage (A.D. 398), canon 12, prescribed one of the duties of widows and deaconesses to be the instruction of the ignorant and rustic women how to make their responses to the interrogatories which the ministers would put to them in baptism; and how to order their conversation afterwards.

In the writings of St. Augustine, and in those attributed to him, we have frequent allusion to the institution of sponsors, with practical advice; e.g. Serm. 163, de Tempore, and to similar purport, De Rectitudine Cathol. Conversat. §§ 2, 4, "I admonish you above all, both men and women who have stood for children in baptism, that you recognise that you are sureties (fidejussores) to God for those whom you have been seen to receive from the font." Where also he adds further injunctions to persevere in this duty: "You ought to admonish them to preserve chastity, love, justice, charity, and above all things teach them the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and Ten Commandments, and the first rudiments of the Christian religion." These instructions are quoted in the canons of Cealchythe, A.D. 785.

In his Epistle to Macedonius, no. 153, he speaks of a surety deceived by him for whom he stood.

The threefold interrogatories put to sponsors, and the promises made in return by them, are often alluded to by St. Augustine, and all is reckoned to the benefit of the child: e.g., "It is piously believed that the faith of those by whom he is offered for consecration is profitable to the infant" (De Lib. Arbitr. iii. 23; and similarly De Baptismo c. Donatist. iv. 31; and De Pecc. Mer. et Rem. lib. i. in various passages, especially in cap. 38).

The questions put to Augustine by a scrupulous bishop, Boniface, occasioned him to treat of the subject of sponsors, and to expound the rationale of them more fully than elsewhere (Ep. ad Bonif. 98, al. 23). He expressly states the Scripture truth that regeneration is by water and the Holy Ghost, not by the will of the parents (1), or by the faith of the sponsors (2), or by the faith of the ministers; where we should observe the distinction between (1) and (2) drawn by the writer. Again, even misdirected faith and lack of right intention, on the part of sponsors, do not vitiate the sacrament. "For it is not so much by those by whose hands they are carried that children are offered for receiving spiritual grace (although by them too, if they be themselves good and faithful), as by the universal society of the saints and faithful; by all, in short, whose love and faith is in operation." Thirdly: "It is not necessary for the removal of original sin, that the children be presented by the parents: for in fact many are often offered by persons, as it may happen, no way related to them, e.g. slaves offered by their masters; or children whose parents were dead are offered by those who have had it in their power to take on them this merciful office. Sometimes also those whom their parents have cruelly exposed to be nurtured by any chance people, are gathered in by holy virgins, and by them presented to baptism. They certainly never had any children of their own, nor have it in prospect."

In the view of this paragraph, exhibiting the great variety of sponsors in that disturbed time, we may believe that Bingham has assumed too much when he says (bk. xi. cap. viii. § 2), "Parents were commonly sponsors for their own children." The dogmatic truth which lay at the foundation of the institution of sponsors is stated by St. Augustine in the latter part of chap. 5 of his letter aforesaid. The very next scruple proposed by Boniface, and dissipated by Augustine, would seem to shew that if parents were sponsors in any case it was not qua parents, but as being members of the church and representing the church; that the primitive doctrine of infant baptism was to make sponsorship depend, not on a natural tie, but on its position in the communion of saints. And the answer of Augustine is made general for all cases, viz. that a child who through his sponsor answers that he believes, does believe, as having received the sacrament of faith, for the sacrament of faith does itself render him a faithful one. It may be added that, as the church was really and ultimately the spiritual mother, so on the church, and not on the sponsors, devolved the duty of maintaining the baptized orphan or destitute.

The writings of Clement of Alexandria, when he treats of regeneration in baptism, with details analogous to those of the birth in the flesh, embody the ancient sense of "godparents," as designating the parties who promote the spiritual regeneration of the infant by taking for him the pledges, or engaging to remind him of them, or both (see Blunt, On the Use of the Fathers, p. 537). And so is the later term "patrini" explained by Hugo, de Sacram. (ap. Durantus, de Rit. Ecc. lib. i. 19): "They are so called because while they offer children to be regenerated to a new life, they in a sort of way become auxiliary to their new regeneration." "That the spiritual generation may be more expressively represented, there being spiritual parents present, they are called parentes, and the suscepti are called fili" (S. Aug. Serm. 116). Other writers speak of the love which a godfather ought to bear towards his godchild as that of a father, not in the way of consanguinity but of spiritual proximity.

From language of this sort the step was perhaps natural to the doctrine associated with the term "spiritual affinity." [PROHIBITED DEGREES, p. 1728.] In the laws of king Ina, A.D. 693, no. 14, the sponsor had a share in his godson's wergild if slain, i.e. the satisfaction to be made in money for murder to the kindred of the murdered party. Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 806, excluded a man from church for having married a woman whose children he had stood for, thus being already a "compater," i.e. "simul pater." The Council of Mayence, A.D. 813, uses the same term "compates spirituales," and orders them to instruct their children in the catholic faith. In canon 55 it is enjoined, "Nullus proprium filium vel filiam de fonte baptismatis suscipiat; nec filii olam, nec commatrem ducat uxorem; nec illam ejus filiam, aut filiam ad confirmationem duxerat." Where the reason on which the canon is based is to be especially observed. It was the same reason which led to the limitation of the number of sponsors again, which originally had been one, and in after years had grown to more.

It was always understood that the promises made by the sponsors were made, not in their own name, but in the name of the baptized, and that they became subsequently responsible.

Bingham (bk. xi. cap. viii.) has collected, as usual, much valuable information on the subject of sponsors. Martene has an apposite quotation from St. Chrysostom 'in Ps. 14,' but the reference is incorrect. [H. B.]

SPOON, EUCHARISTIC. In the 7th century in the East communicants often used small vessels, sometimes of gold, in which to receive the sacred elements and convey them to their mouth. This practice was forbidden by the Council of Constantinople in 691, on the ground that there could be nothing more meet for that office than the hand of the Christian (can. 101). From the language of John Damascene, 730, "With hands put together crosswise let us receive the body of the Crucified" (De Fide Orthod. iv. 13), and from the absence of all later mention of these vessels, we infer that the practice was effectually suppressed. It is probable, however, that the tradition of their use suggested that of the spoon which somewhat later became general in the Greek and in most of the Oriental churches. This was first employed, as is supposed (Maldonatus, de Caerem. Disp. 2, xxii. 3), to take out of the chalice, after the COMMIXTURE, so much of the steeped oblate as was to be reserved for the sick; but afterwards both for that purpose and for the communion of the laity.

The Greeks call the spoon λαβίς, the tongs, in allusion to Isaiah vi. 6, it being a very common thing with them to speak of the Eucharist under the figure of a "live coal;" a usage yet more common among the Syrians (St. Chrys. Hom. in illud Vidi Dom. § 3; Joan. Damasc. u. s.; St. Ephrem, Comm. in Esai. u. s. ii. 31, Rom. 1740). Hence even a conventional Syrian name for the sacrament, viz. gmurto, a coal (J. S. Assemani in Biblioth. Orient. i. 70; Renaud. Liturg. Orient. ii. 63). At first the fingers were spoken of as the tongs, as in the liturgy of Jerusalem: "The Lord shall bless us and make us meet to take up the fiery coal with the pure tongs of the fingers, and to lay it on the mouth of the faithful" (Assem. Codex. Lit. v. 56). When the image was transferred to the spoon we cannot say. In a Coptic prayer at the consecration of the latter, the bishop, after a reference to the angel "in whose hands were the tongs with which he took the live coal from the altar," proceeds thus: "Now also, O God, . . . stretch forth Thy hand over this spoon, in which are to be taken up the members of the holy body," &c. (Renaud. i. 54).

In all the churches of the East the laity receive the elements together, i.e. the body steeped in the blood, and in all except the Armenian (Le Brun, Dissert. x. 21) the spoon is employed. In the Syrian rite the minister assisting, whether priest or deacon, may receive them either separately or from the spoon (Renaud. ii. 119); in other Oriental churches and in the Greek he always receives in the former manner (Goar, Euchol. Gr. 82, 83, 149; Renaul. ii. 118).

Intinction, as the practice of steeping the body in the blood was called in the West, is thought by some (Ligarius in Goar, 152; Arcudius, Concord. Occ. et Or. iii. 53) to have been first adopted (with the use of the spoon) in consequence of a heretic at Constantinople, whom St. Chrysostom was communicating, having carried off the Eucharist which he had placed in her hand (see Sozom. Hist. Eccl. viii. 5). It is more probable, however, that a custom so general was suggested by the convenience found in ministering thus to the sick. In a story told by Eusebius the person sent to a dying man with the Eucharist, the priest himself being sick, was directed to moisten it and drop it into the mouth (Hist. Eccl. vi. 44). The Council of Carthage, A.D. 398, orders "the Eucharist to be poured into the mouth" of those who have become insensible (can. 76). In the same city, not much later, a woman who had an obstruction in the throat received a "steeped particle of the Lord's body" (De Prom. et Praed. Dei, Dim. Temp. 6, inter Opp. Prosp.).

When intinction for ordinary communions began to prevail in Europe, it seems, like so many other minor rites, to have been introduced from the East through Spain and Portugal; for we find the first mention of it in a prohibition by the Council of Braga, A.D. 675. The ground alleged was that our Lord gave the bread and wine to the apostles separately (can. 2). The practice thus received a great check among the Latins, but in the 11th century we find it general. In the 12th it was suppressed, very much because it suggested the sop of Judas, but still under the authority of the canon of Braga, which was then known as a decree of pope Julius (Notitia Eucharistica, 705, ed. 2). There is no evidence that a spoon was ever employed in the West during the prevalence of intinction.

So far as I have discovered, the only proof that the practice of intinction existed in Europe between the 7th and the 11th centuries is to be found in the words of delivery used in many churches at the communion of the sick, and in directions that have reference to them. The form given by Theodulf of Orleans, A.D. 794, runs thus: "The body and the blood of the Lord be unto thee remission of all sins," &c. (Capit. ii. in Baluze, Miscell. ii. 104, ed. 2). A Scottish order of the beginning of the 9th century: "The body with the blood," &c. (Book of Deer, 90). Similarly two Irish orders in the Books of Dimna and Moling (Liber de Arbuthnot, xix. xxi.). Prudentius of Troyes, A.D. 846: "The body and blood of our Lord," &c. (in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. vii. 6, n. 3). Regino, A.D. 906, gives a canon of Tours of uncertain date, in which it is expressly ordered that the "sacred oblation be steeped in the blood of Christ, that the presbyter may be able to say with truth, The body and blood," &c. (De Discipl. Eccl. i. 70. See again Not. Euch. 1023). In the 11th century some formulae of delivery verbally recognised the intinction: "The body of our Lord Jesus Christ, steeped in His blood, preserve thy soul," &c. (Pontif. Suesson. in Mart. v. s. 16; Miss. Ambros. cited by Sala in Bona, Rer. Lit. ii. 18, § 2) [W. E. S.]

SPORTULA is properly the basket used in distributing presents of money or food to clients (Juvenal, iii. 249). Hence it came to be applied to presents or donations generally, and Cyprian calls the clergy of his time "sportulantes fratres," as depending upon the contributions of their flock (Epist. 1, p. 466, Hartel). (2) Sept. 28; commemorated at Rome (Mart. Usuard., Hierou.).

STAFF (Baculus, cambuca). During the saying of long offices, consisting principally of psalmody, at which it was usual to stand, it was permitted for the worshippers to lean on a long staff or crutch by way of relief (Martene, de Rit. Eccl. Ant. iv. xv. 13). Chrodegang of Metz in his Rule (c. 26) does not permit this indulgence to his canons, unless in case of infirmity. The monks of Fulda in their supplication to Charles the Great (Migne, Patrol. cv. 419) complain that their abbat did not permit even the infirm to use a staff or to lean on the standing-desk (inclinatorium or reclinatorium). The staff was laid aside at the reading of the Gospel (see p. 744). For the staff of the bishop, see PASTORAL STAFF. [C.]

STAG (IN ART). From a very early date in Christian symbolism and iconography, the stag has been used to represent the Gentile convert thirsting for and approaching the waters of baptism [CROSS, p. 496]. He accompanies the lambs or sheep, the catechumens of Christian or Jewish birth, in most baptismal works of art, as the Lateran cross, the frescoes of St. Pontianus, and the more ancient mosaics of the Ravenna baptisteries.

The stag is represented in the mosaics of Ciampini (De sacr. Aedif. cap. ix.); on tombs (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. c. 3; see also for later paintings Bottari, tav. xlv.); on lamps (Arlinghi, ii. p. 603; see LAMPS, p. 921).

It would seem, from a Ravenna sarcophagus given by Ciampini (Vet. Mon. ii. p. 7, tab. iii. D), where two stags are represented with the chalice (as birds frequently at Ravenna), that the animal symbolises the desire of the faithful for the other sacrament also. These examples on Christian tombs can hardly have a secular meaning only; though occasionally, as in Buonarrotti (Frammenti di Oetro, xxiv.), the stag only appears as a beast of chase. It is seen in this sense very frequently on the Lombard carvings from the 8th to the 11th century; very notably in the celebrated hunt of Theodoric on the façade of S. Zenone at Verona. [R. St. J. STAGE. [ACTORS; THEATRE.]

STALLS, SEATS (θρόνος; [concessus presbyterorum; sedes; formula [Magri, Hierolexicon]; vestilum). Compare STASIDIA.

The most ancient notices describe the seats for the presbyters as being arranged in the arc of the apse, behind the altar, on either side of the seat (θρόνος) of the bishop, which was in the middle of them (Apost. Constit. l. 2, c. 57). Bingham (Antiq. lib. ii. cap. xix. § 6) thinks that this arrangement may be the reason why the body of presbyters was called by Ignatius (Ep. ad Magnes. 13) the "crown of the presbytery." The term "throne" was not anciently confined to the seat of a bishop, but was applied to that of the presbyter also. Presbyters were spoken of by Constantine (Euseb. l. 10, c. 5) as "certain persons from the second throne." St. Gregory of Nazianzum speaks of himself (de Vita sua) as forced by violence "into the second throne," i.e. into priests' orders. This arrangement, says Viollet-le-Duc (Dict. rais. de l'Architecture, s. v. Choeur), was maintained in some cathedrals, for example in that of Lyons, down to the middle of the 18th century. The same writer (ibid. s. v. Stalle) affirms that in France stalls were constructed in wood at a very remote period. In Italy and Sicily, on the contrary, they were sometimes made in stone or marble, a practice which the comparative rigour of the climate rendered unsuitable in France. There are no stalls remaining in France anterior to the time of Charlemagne; but the earliest specimens that are left can only, says Viollet-le-Duc, be the consequence of a long tradition.

The principle upon which official seats were assigned in the early church seems to have been this, that seats were the index of spiritual rank. Hence great care was taken that men who were in deacons' orders should not sit with those of superior spiritual rank. As early as the Council of Nicaea there is a trace that deacons were endeavouring to thrust themselves into the row of priests. By the 18th canon of that council the disposition on their part to intrude into the "highest seats of the synagogue" is formally condemned. "But let it not be permitted to the deacons to sit in the midst of the presbyters, for that which is taking place is contrary to canon and contrary to order." It should be observed that deacons were always forbidden to sit amongst the priests in the sanctuary (see the 15th canon of the Council of Arles, ap. Martene, iii. 1, 7). The deacons were bound to stand.

It is not easy to say precisely when the arrangement of the clergy behind the altar, which originated in the East, was superseded by the plan of a choir with which we are now familiar. But the ancient arrangement of the clergy appears to have prevailed in the French church in the 6th century. Queen Chrodieldis, with the cross in her hand, enters the church to denounce the abbess, and presents herself before the assembled priests, who take their seats in the tribunal of the church—"Tunc residentibus sacerdotibus qui aderant super tribunal ecclesiae" (Greg. Turon. Hist. Francorum, lib. x. 15).

No mention of those appendages to choir stalls which are known as Misericordes (Misericordiae) has been found within the period comprised in this work.

[H. T. A.]

STAMINEA (also stamineum, staminia, &c.). A woollen under-garment used by monks. The Rule of Fructuosus allots "staminiae duae" to each (c. 4, Patrol. lxxxvii. 1101; reproduced in the Concordia Regularum of Benedict of Aniane, c. 17, Patrol. ciii. 1248, where see Menard's note). The Regula Magistri, making a distinction according to the seasons, orders that in winter each monk should have "paraturam grossam quotidianam stamineam." Reference is also made below to a "pallium stamineum" (c. 80, Patrol. lxxxviii. 1030). See Ducange's Glossary, s. v.

[R. S.]

STANDING was, as is well known, a common posture among the ancient Christians in PRAYER [p. 1684], on hearing the GOSPEL [p. 744] or sermons, and during PSALMODY [p. 1747], which formed a large portion of the daily offices. Compare STAFF, p. 1926.

STAPIO. A word of doubtful meaning, but standing for some article of female dress or ornament. In his Life of St. Radegundis (c. 13; Patrol. lxxxviii. 503) Venantius Fortunatus describes the rich objects deposited by the queen at different altars, including the above. Mabillon suggests that scapio (with the meaning of some sort of crown) should be read (Acta Sanctorum ordinis Benedicti, saec. i. 321). He argues that if stapio be retained, it must be some kind of ornament for the feet.

STARS (IN ART). One or more stars are often seen on either side of the figure of Christ on early glasses, &c., which are regarded by Buonarroti as symbols of His divinity (Vetri, p. 38). A Christian lamp given by Bellori (Antiche Lucerne, part iii. 29) presents the Good Shepherd with His head encircled by seven stars. Sometimes the monogram alone appears thus attended (ibid. viii. 1). A starry field is frequently used in early Christian art as emblematical of heaven. At St. Vitalis at Ravenna the Holy Lamb is seen in a field thus sown with stars (Ciampini, tab. 18), and the cross is similarly placed in the chapel of Galla Placidia (ibid. tab. 65). On a sarcophagus at Arles stars, alternately single and double, are placed between the heads of the apostles (Millin. pl. lxx. 3; Le Blant, pl. xiv. p. 27). The figure of Habakkuk bringing food to Daniel on a sarcophagus at Brescia has seven stars above his head (Le Blant, p. 12). A single star, together with emblems of the Resurrection, and a Dove surrounded with stars, are seen on a gem given by Perret (Catacombes, iv. pl. xvi. 8). A young man with four stars on his tunic, accompanied with eucharistic emblems, is found on a glass (Maranzoni, Cose Gentileschi). In the representations of the Nativity and the Epiphany the star is an almost unailing accompaniment of the scene. Instances will be found in the woodcuts of the articles NATIVITY; MAGI, ADORATION OF.

STASIDIA. The stalls in the monastic and other churches of the East. They are distinguished from the stalls of the Western church by their being originally, as their name implies, places for standing in, not for sitting. They had no seats, and their occupants supported themselves when weary on the elbows of the stalls, which corresponded to the crutches which were and are still much used by the worshippers in the Eastern churches. Suicer defines them with much accuracy as "sedilia in quibus sacerdotes vel sedentes quiescunt, vel stantes accumbendo laborem levius ferunt; eo ordine ut digniores dignius occupent sedile" (sub voc.). Goar states that the stall of the "hegumenos" was the furthest to the east, on the south side opposite the "icon" of the patron saint (Euchol. p. 4, n. 35). He says also that in monastic churches they were usually returned, but not in parish churches (ibid. 19). Each monk had his own stall. The Typicon S. Sabae speaks repeatedly of a monk going eis τὸ στασίδιον αὐτοῦ. They are sometimes called τόποι. [E. V.]

STASIS (στάσις), one of the subdivisions of the Greek Psalter. In the Greek church the Psalms are divided into twenty groups, called καθίσματα or sessions. Each καθίσμα is divided into three στάσεις by the recital of the formula, Δόξα καὶ νῦν. Ἀλληλούϊα. So imperative was this rule that even Psalm cxix., which by itself constitutes the 17th session, was divided into three στάσεις. And further, when the number of Psalms in a session is even, still the odd number of στάσεις in it was preserved by grouping two or more Psalms together. With this may be compared the Western practice of securing the same result by saying two Psalms under one Gloria Patri. For further information on this curious subject the present writer may be permitted to refer to an essay upon it in his volume on The Gradual Psalms.

For the actual division of the Psalter see PSALMODY.

Suicer thinks the term στάσις arises either (1) from their standing to recite the Psalms, or (2) from their standing up at the close of each session (Thesaurus, s. v.). Perhaps, however, it may have meant a halt or stop, a sense which the word acquired in post-classical Greek.

STATE AND CHURCH. [Law.]

STATIO. 1. By early Latin writers was applied to a fast day. Yet a distinction can be drawn between jejunium and statio.

There has been much difference of opinion whether a statio differed at all from a fast (jejunium); and if so, in what respect it differed. Pamelius, for example, argues that there is no difference. Bona, however, concludes that the statio is sometimes identical with the jejunium, and sometimes not. The statio closed at none, the jejunium (proper, e.g. in Lent) at vesper; then they were different. But sometimes the shorter fast (which Tertullian calls semi-jejunium) was called jejunium. In this case the faithful might take food at none, and then the fast was the same as the statio. The relation between statio and jejunium is discussed by Bona (de Horis Div. Psalmody, cap. iii.). In Tertullian, he says, solvere stationem is the same as jejuniumolvere. But Gregory the Great assigned certain churches of the city (Rome) to stations, and on the more solemn days commanded that stations should be done (stationes fieri) until sext, and to those churches on stated days (statis diebus—this perhaps suggests the origin of the term statio) the faithful usually resort. The stations, Bona complains, have disappeared, owing to the chill that has come upon love, and the abstinence of the fast alone remains.

The classical passage on the subject in very early writers is a clause of Tertullian's: "Similiter et stationum diebus non putant plerique sacrificiorum orationibus interveniendum quod statio solvenda sit accepto corpore Domini" (de Orat. c. xiv.). To this there may be added one or two other sayings of the same writer (de Jejun. c. 14; ib. c. 10; ib. c. 13), from which we gather that the statio was held on Wednesday and Friday in every week throughout the year (because, according to Gratian, on those days respectively the betrayal was planned and the Crucifixion accomplished), and that it lasted till the ninth hour. The fast on these two days of the week is enjoined by the sixty-ninth of the Apostolical Canons, though the Greek equivalent of the name statio does not appear there. It may be added that bishop Beverege's long note upon this canon will be found to give the most complete and the clearest résumé of the facts, amidst all that has been written upon the subject (Pandectae Annot. p. 35).

It has been already suggested that the fast was called statio, because the solemnity was kept on fixed days (statis diebus); but St. Ambrose gives another account of the origin of the term. "Our fasts are our encampments which protect us from the devil's attack; in short, they are called stationes, because standing (stantes) and staying in them we repel our plotting foes" (S. Ambr. Serm. 25). Tertullian likewise undoubtedly takes advantage of this military sense of the word (stationem facere) in his treatise de Coronâ Militis (cap. xi.). For an account of how the fast of the Wednesday statio became in process of time exchanged for the Saturday fast in some parts of the West, see SABBATH.

2. An assembly of the faithful in church, especially that which took place on the Lord's day. It has been mentioned above that Gregory the Great regulated these stations in Rome, but it is clear that he did not originate them: for though the word appears to be used in the sense of the Fast in all the passages of Tertullian (see the several notes on them in the Oxford translation), yet it (στάσις) is used by St. Gregory of Nazianzum in a passage where it could hardly mean anything but an assembly (Greg. Naz. Orat. hab. in Concilio Const.). The term has an obvious appropriateness in a Greek church, where there were no seats and all had to stand.

3. In a sense closely connected with the foregoing, a station is a church, oratory, or other place where ecclesiastical processions made a halt, and certain offices of divine worship were performed, sometimes the service of the Holy Eucharist itself. From this it came to pass that the processions themselves were called stationes. They were first instituted by Cyril of Alexandria (Ducange, s. v.). The tombs of the martyrs were often the scenes of stations. In later times the term was used of a procession made by all the clergy of a city to some leading church of the city. (Anselm. Leod. c. 69, in Wolb.) Ducange says that when the clergy from the various churches were assembled at a station, any difficult question that was pending was settled. This fact, he thinks, accounts for Tertullian's statement that the station was sometimes prolonged to the vesper hour. It appears from St. Cyprian (Ep. 41) that the Novatian schismatics demanded that their charges should be investigated "in statione." Some have thought that it was the stations of this class that Gregory the Great took order to regulate ("sollicitè ordinavit"), and that while taking part in them he delivered many of his homilies on the gospels. This would point to the use of the eucharistic office in the station. The same use, too, prevailed in the church of Constantinople, where we are told that the epistle and gospel at the stations used to be recited in Latin (Nicolaus I. Ep. 8). Anastasius again (in S. Vitaliano) speaks of a station "ad Sanctum Petrum" on the Lord's day, and of the mass being celebrated there. It is not unlikely, indeed, that in the early Christian mind statio was eminently connected with the Eucharist, because the corresponding word (מַעְבָּד) was already in use in the ritual of Israel in connexion with the sacred oblation (see Buxtorf, Lex. Talmud. s. v. מַעְבָּד); and statio may be an example of those many ideas which Christianity adopted from Judaism. Hofmann (Lex. Univ. s. v.) boldly defines statio as ritus audiendi Evangelium. This, however, would seem to restrict the liturgical use of the word too much.

At these stations the sacramental vessels were carried in procession. Anastasius tells us that this practice existed as early as the time of Hilarus (A.D. 461), the successor of Leo the Great in the papal see. Leo the Third (A.D. 795) made twenty such vessels of the purest silver, to be carried by acolytes in procession ("qui praeceperent per stationes per manus acolytorum").

In modern times the term stationes is most often applied to the use of certain devotions in front of pictures or sculptures representing the leading incidents of our Lord's Passion. Of this use, however, no example has been found within the period to which the present work is restricted. [H. T. A.]

STATIONS OF PENITENTS. [PENITENCE, p. 1591.]

STAUROPEGIUM (σταυροπήγιον). The solemn act of fixing a cross by the bishop of the diocese, at the foundation of a church or monastery. The service and ceremonial in use on such an occasion, with full rubrical directions, are given in Goar's Euchologion, pp. 608-613. This custom is an ancient one. It is probably alluded to by St. Chrysostom, when he asks, "What community is there which has not the staff and cross? What church which has not been fortified with the cross?" (Hom. in Baia.); and it is distinctly mentioned by later writers (Balsamon in can. vii. Septimae Synodi).

In later times the term came to denote a special right claimed by a patriarch to consecrate a church in any diocese within his province, by sending a small wooden inscribed cross to be fixed behind the altar. Such a church became the patriarch's peculiar, exempt from ordinary diocesan jurisdiction. An account of the controversies caused by this custom is given in Ducange, Glossary, Graec. Med. Aevi, s. v. See for further authorities on the subject J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, Gen. Intro. p. 1041.

STAUROPHYLAX. After the supposed discovery of the true cross by St. Helena, the custody of the holy relic was committed for the time being to one of the presbyters of the church of Jerusalem, who was thence called δ σταυροφύλαξ. It was regarded as a position of very high dignity, and the holder of it was frequently advanced to the episcopate. Porphyrius bishop of Gaza (A.D. 421) held the office, as did John III. bishop of Jerusalem (513-524). "Elias episcopus Hierosolymae exilio traditur et pro eo Joannes crucis custos episcopus ordinatur" (apud Ducange sub voc.). The names of several presbyters who were "guardians of the Cross" occur in the biographies of St. Euthymius and St. Sabas by Cyril of Scythopolis. [E. V.]

STEPHEN, ST., PROTOMARTYR, LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF. 1. Legend.—In one of the appendices to the works of Augustine is a letter from Avitus, a Spanish priest then living in Palestine, to Palchonius, bishop of Bracara (Braga) in Spain, which was to be conveyed to him by Orosius the historian, then about to return to Spain, which was his native land. Besides the letter, Avitus further entrusted Orosius with some relics of St. Stephen, and with a Latin translation of the Greek narrative of Lucian, to whom, it was believed, had been vouchsafed the discovery of the martyr's remains (Augustine, vol. vii. 1125, ed. Gaume).

We shall proceed to give, in the first place, a brief abstract of this latter document. Lucian was priest of the church of Caphar-Gamala, a village twenty miles from Jerusalem, and on a certain Friday ("parasceue, hoc est sexta feria"), three days before the Nones of December, Honorius being for the second time, and Theodosius for the sixth time, consuls (Dec. 8, A.D. 415), he was lying half asleep in the baptistery, where his bed was placed that he might guard the sacred vessels. Here, at the third hour of the night, he saw a vision of an old man clad in white, with a golden wand in his hand, who commanded him to go to John, bishop of Jerusalem, and bid him open his sepulchre. He further announced that he was Gamaliel, the teacher of Paul, and that he had caused the remains of Stephen to be secretly conveyed by night from the scene of his martyrdom outside the north gate of Jerusalem to Caphar-Gamala. Here Gamaliel laid the body in his own tomb, on the east side; and subsequently Nicodemus, who had been excommunicated by the Jews and had been maintained by Gamaliel, was laid in the same tomb. There also Abibas, a son of Gamaliel, who had with his father been baptized into Christ, and had died before his father, was laid. Last of all, Gamaliel himself was buried there; but his wife Ethna, and his eldest son Selemais, not having embraced the faith of Christ, were buried elsewhere.

Lucian, on awaking, doubted the reality of the vision, and prayed that if it were sent by God it might be repeated a second and a third time. On the following Friday the vision appeared again, and Gamaliel asked why Lucian had not obeyed. On being told the reason, he shewed as emblems of the relics three golden baskets filled with roses (one with red for Stephen, two with white for Nicodemus and Gamaliel), and a silver basket filled with fragrant crocuses for Abibas. The vision then vanished. Yet a third time it appeared. On the following Friday, at the same hour, Gamaliel appeared and upbraided him for neglecting to obey.

Lucian, being now convinced, set off for Jerusalem, and related the story to the bishop, who bade him dig for the relics, it being believed that they would be found under a heap of stones in the field indicated by Gamaliel. However, Gamaliel in a vision to a monk named Migetius explained that the bodies were not there, but had merely been laid down there at the funeral, the heap having been set in sign of mourning. The bodies really lay in the north part of the field, in a spot called Debatalia. A vain examination of the heap proved the truth of the last vision, and the relics in four coffins were found at the spot indicated. On that of St. Stephen was engraved, according to one text, "Keayea Celiel, quod interpretatur servus Dei" (c. 8, Op. Cit. 1133); according to another, "Celiel quod Stephanus dicitur" (ib. 1134). The latter interpretation is of course the correct one, celil (לֵילִי) being a common Aramaean word for a crown, as Stephen in Greek. Bishop John, then at the Council of Lidda or Diospolis, being at once informed, came to the spot, bringing with him Eleutherius bishop of Sebaste, and Eleutherius (al. Eustonius) of Jericho. When the coffin of St. Stephen was opened, the earth shook, and a fragrant odour was diffused, by which seventy-three persons were restored to health. The coffin was then reclosed, and was carried to Jerusalem, as the church of which St. Stephen had been deacon; a small portion of the relics being left at Caphar-Gamala. This translation was made, according to one text, on Dec. 26 (7 Kal. Jan.), or, according to the other, on Aug. 3 (3 Non. Aug.).

We cannot of course attempt to define accurately the historical element in this legend, still it is clear that some discovery of the relics, real or supposed, took place; and that this was followed by universal credence in the story. Thus, for example, as we shall presently see, Augustine, in the twenty-second book of the De Civitate Dei, written a few years after the above events are said to have happened, refers to miracles supposed to have been wrought by relics of St. Stephen brought from Palestine to the province of Africa; and the events are taken for granted by most of the immediately succeeding writers. The series of visions supposed to have been seen by Lucian we may readily allow; it demands nothing more from us than to credit Lucian with a lively imagination and an intense faith. Explorations in pursuance of these visions might easily be rewarded by the finding of a body, even if not so simply as the story makes out. We are not called upon either to lay to the charge of bishop John a craftily conceived and carefully worked-out imposture, or to accept the elaborate story in all its details. Much of these, the names upon the coffins and the like, we may readily discard as mere embellishments—a story of this kind never loses by the telling.

The news, when promulgated, would be, we can well believe, eagerly caught up. Relics were, as we have seen, widely dispersed; and the simple but intense faith of the time might often, by its very intensity, do marvels. Thus, for instance, the case of Paulus and Palladia, afterwards to be mentioned, is just one where strong faith, working on the line of strong nervous excitement, might well produce the results said to have happened.

We return now to Orosius. We find from the letter of Avitus that, in Dec. A.D. 415, he was eagerly looking forward to his return journey from Palestine. He returned to Augustine in the following year (Aug. Epist. 175, § 1; vol. ii. 923), bringing with him portions of the relics of St. Stephen, which Avitus had obtained from Lucian (Avitus, l. c.; Gennadius, de Viris Illustribus, c. 39; Patrol. lviii. 1081). The history by which Orosius is most generally known was then written; and after this he set sail for Spain with the relics. On his way, he landed on the island of Minorca; and here, learning that the Goths were ravaging Spain, and that it would hardly be possible for him to return thither, he settled rather to return to Africa, having intrusted his relics to the church in Minorca (Severus, Epist. ad omnem Ecclesiam, § 3; apud August., vol. vii. 1146, in Append.).

We have said that the belief in the discovery of St. Stephen's relics soon spread widely. Besides Augustine, of whom we have already spoken, and to whom we shall recur presently, we may mention Chrysippus, a priest of the church of Jerusalem, living about the middle of the 5th century. Photius (Bibliotheca, cod. 171; Patrol. Gr. ciii. 500) says that he had read a work of Chrysippus, a panegyric of Theodore the martyr, where, in a digression, he speaks of Lucian and his vision, and the consequent discovery. At about the same period, Basil of Seleucia wrote a panegyric of St. Stephen and concerning the discovery of the relics (Orat. 41; Patrol. Gr. lxxxv. 461). The Chronicle of Idatius mentions the manifestation (martyr Stephanus revelatur) at Jerusalem in the episcopate of John (Patrol. li. 877); and the Chronicle of Marcellinus speaks of the discovery of the relics and of Lucian's narrative (ib. 923; see also Gennadius, de Viris Illustribus, 39, 46, 47; Patrol. lviii. 1080 sqq.).

We now return to Augustine. In the last book (the twenty-second) of the De Civitate Dei, written apparently towards the close of A.D. 426, he tells us of numerous miracles that had been wrought by the help of the relics in and near Hippo (c. 8, §§ 10-22, vol. vii. 1065), where a memoria or oratory of St. Stephen had been built about A.D. 425 (ibid. § 20), in commemoration, it would appear, of the arrival in Africa of fresh relics of the martyr. A sermon of Augustine's seems to have been delivered specially for this occasion (Serm. 317, vol. v. 1870), and the succeeding one when the relics were deposited in the church erected for them. In a letter of Augustine's to bishop Quintilian, commending two ladies to his care, he remarks that they are the bearers of relics of St. Stephen, "which your Holiness knows in what befitting way you ought to honour, even as we ourselves have done" (Epist. 212, vol. ii. 1194).

Besides the memoria at Hippo, Augustine specifies Aquae Tibilitanae, a place between Hippo and Cirta, Sinita, a town near Hippo, and Calama, where Possidius was bishop. At all these places, and at others near, as well as at Hippo, were memoriae of St. Stephen. Augustine remarks (ibid. § 20) that though he has mentioned many miracles, he has also passed over many, which, were they all to be given, "plurimi conficiendi sunt libri." He adds that not only in the country round Hippo, but at Uzalis also, a town near Utica, many wonders were done. The bishop of Uzalis, Evodius, an intimate friend of Augustine, caused a work to be written, De Miraculis S. Stephani Protomartyris, in two books, which is given in the Appendix to the seventh volume of Augustine (col. 1161 sq.).

One more example may be added, seeing that it was made the occasion of several sermons by Augustine, the case of Paulus and Palladia (de Civitate Dei, xxii. 8. 22; Serm. 320-324, vol. v. 1881). These were two out of ten children of a lady at Caesarea in Cappadocia, all of whom their mother's curse had afflicted with a terrible shaking of their limbs. The two above-named came at last in their wanderings to Hippo, about fifteen days before Easter. Here they daily visited the memoria of St. Stephen, and while praying on Easter morning, the youth was suddenly healed. On Easter Tuesday Augustine, in his sermon, embodied the whole deposition of Paulus (Serm. 322, supra), and on that day the sister was restored as the brother had been. Obviously, however, the above admits, as we have already said, of a very simple explanation, without recourse being had to the theory of miracles properly so called.

Another place where the cultus of St. Stephen early prevailed was Ancona. Augustine relates (Serm. 323, vol. v. 1884) that at the martyrdom of St. Stephen, a certain man picked up a stone that had rebounded after striking the martyr's elbow.^a This man was a sailor, and, once being at Ancona, it was revealed to him that he should deposit the stone there, which he did, and thenceforth a memoria of St. Stephen existed in that place. This is mentioned by Gregory the Great (Dial. lib. i. 5; Patrol. lxxvii. 177).

Into later legends it is not worth while to enter at length, but we shall give them a passing notice. A translation of St. Stephen's body from Jerusalem to Constantinople is mentioned by Nicephorus Callistus (Hist. Eccles. xiv. 9; Patrol. Gr. cxlvi. 1084) as taking place in the reign of Constantine. This, of course, is at variance with the story of Lucian. Theodorus Lector (Hist. Eccles. ii. 64; Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi. 215) also speaks of a translation to Constantinople, but puts it in the reign of Theodosius II. on a certain September 21. The story of the translation, with much the same details as that told by Nicephorus, is given in a writing purporting to be a translation into Latin by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, and sent by him with an accompanying letter to Landuleus, bishop of Capua (Augustine, vol. vii. 1137 sqq.).

From this we gather that Capua, too, claimed to possess relics of St. Stephen. In this narrative the translation to Constantinople is referred to the episcopate of bishop John. In the Martyrologium Romanum is recorded, under May 7, a translation of the body of St. Stephen from Constantinople to Rome in the pontificate of Pelagius, when it was laid in the sepulchre of St. Laurence. Even Baronius, however (not. in loc.), gives up this legend.

To draw illustrations from other districts than those we have already cited, we find Gregory of Tours speaking of the relics of St. Stephen taken into Gaul (Hist. Franc. i. 30; De Gloria Martyrum, i. 34; Patrol. lxxi. 177, 734). For the story of the African bishop Gaudiosus fleeing from the persecution of the Vandal king Genseric to Naples, and of the relics of St. Stephen taken with him, see Baronius (not. ad Mart. Rom. Aug. 3, Nov. 28). We may note in conclusion before leaving this part of our subject, that the empress Eudocia, wife of Theodosius II., built a church just outside Jerusalem, on the scene of St. Stephen's martyrdom, and was herself interred there on her death in A.D. 461 (see e.g. Nicephorus Callistus, Hist. Eccles. xiv. 50; Patrol. Gr. cxlvi. 1240).

2. Festivals.—The discovery of the relics in Palestine, whatever explanation we may give of the matter, soon caused the commemoration of St. Stephen to be widely observed as a festival of high importance. Still, prior to the date of that event, we have definite traces of the existence of a festival of St. Stephen. Thus we have two sermons for the festival by Gregory of Nyssa (ob. circa A.D. 396), in which, as well as in that next to be mentioned, we are told that it fell on the day after Christmas (Patrol. Gr. xlii. 701, 721). We also have a sermon for the day by Asterius,^b bishop of Amasea in Pontus, which we may safely refer to a date prior to A.D. 415 (Hom. 12; Patrol. Gr. xl. 338). Indeed the absence from the above three sermons of any allusions to the discovery in Palestine would of itself be evidence. The homilies, however, for the festival of St. Stephen, once attributed to Chrysostom, are clearly spurious (vol. viii. 501, 699; xii. 929, 931, 933, ed. Migne).

^a The play upon Ancona and ἄγκων is of course obvious.

To the above may, we think, be added the instance mentioned by Augustine (supra) of the ancient memoria of St. Stephen at Ancona. If Augustine honestly believed that this had been built at a period not long subsequent to the martyrdom, we may fairly acquiesce in at any rate sufficient antiquity to carry it back to a time before A.D. 415. The reference to the festival of St. Stephen in the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 33) would be of great importance, if only we had more definite knowledge of the date of the work. In the passage cited, it is ordered by Peter and Paul that slaves are to rest on certain great festivals, besides which are the days of the apostles and of Stephen and other martyrs unspecified.

It may at once be allowed, however, that these isolated notices do not suffice to establish the existence of a festival observed by the church at large, and thus we record its absence from the Roman calendar of Bucherius, a document of about the middle of the 4th century. When, however, we pass to the period after A.D. 415, we soon find all ancient calendars, martyrologies, and liturgies agreeing in containing a commemoration or commemorations of St. Stephen. The days specially associated with him are Dec. 26 and Aug. 3. The first is certainly the commemoration of the martyrdom, both because we have it mentioned in writings prior to the date of the finding of the relics, and because of the constancy with which it is so noted in ancient authorities. On the other hand, one text of Lucian's narrative gives Dec. 26 as the date of the translation, the other referring it to Aug. 3. Probably the latter date really commemorates the consecration of some church in honour of St. Stephen, or the like event, but, as we shall presently see, it is generally associated with the translation.

The festival of Dec. 26 is recorded in the Roman calendar of Polemeus Silvius of A.D. 448 (Patrol. xiii. 688), and in the Calendarium Carthaginiense, which is probably only slightly subsequent to A.D. 484 (ib. 1228). It is not necessary to give an extended list of ancient authorities recognising the festival; it may suffice to mention the Mart. Hieronymi as edited by D'Achéry from the Corbey MS. (Patrol. xxx. 437), the Mart. Gellonense (D'Achéry, Spicilegium, xiii. 390), the Gelasian (Patrol. lxxiv. 1309), the Gregorian (ib. lxxviii. 33), and Ambrosian (Pamelius, Liturgg. Lat. i. 306) Sacramentaries, the Mozarabic Missal, the Lectionarium Luxoviense, the Gothic-Gallic Missal, and others. To the Leonine Sacramentary we shall refer at length below. Among the fathers who have written homilies for the day are Maximus of Turin^c (Hom. 64, Serm. 85; Patrol. lvii. 379, 701) and Fulgentius of Ruspe (Serm. 3; Patrol. lxxv. 729). Again, Aug. 3 is given as the date of commemoration of the discovery of the relics, e.g. in the Mart. Corbeienae (supra), the Martyrologies of Bede (Patrol. xciv. 996), Rabanus Maurus (ib. cx. 1160), Wandalbert (ib. cxxi. 606), Notker (ib. cxxxi. 1131), &c., and in one text of Lucian's narrative. Besides the above-mentioned two days, the Mart. Corbeienae also cites a commemoration at Jerusalem on Jan. 2, and at Antioch the "natales reliquiarum Stephani protomartyris et diaconi," on Aug. 2. It is not improbable that in this last case Antioch is an error for Ancona, for several martyrologies (e.g. Bede, supra), while naming Antioch, add the story of the stone which struck St. Stephen's arm, mentioned by us above. Also Aug. 2 is perhaps an error for Aug. 3, on which day the reference occurs in Bede, Rabanus Maurus, &c.

It is now necessary to enter into details in connexion with one or two liturgical monuments. The Leonine Sacramentary makes no mention of St. Stephen among its December festivals, though it recognises there the festivals of St. John and the Innocents. In August, however, we have the heading "iv. nonas Augusti. Natale Sancti Stephani in coemeterio Callisti via Appia," after which follow no less than nine masses for a festival of St. Stephen (Patrol. lv. 91). Muratori, connecting the heading with the masses, considered that the iv. nonas was an error for iii. nonas, but there is no doubt that the Stephen mentioned in the heading is Stephen bishop of Rome (ob. A.D. 257), for in the Depositio Episcoporum (i.e. of Rome), which stands at the head of the calendar of Bucherius, we have "iv. nonas Augusti Stephani in Callisti" (Bucherius, de Doctrina Temporum, p. 267). Also the Mart. Corbeienae gives under the same date, "Romae in coemeterio Calisti Sancti Stephani martyris," and the Mart. Gellonense, "Roma Stephani episcopi et martyris." In like manner, too, the Gregorian Sacramentary gives a mass for the day (Patrol. lxxviii. 128). While, however, there can be no doubt as to the reference in the heading in the Leonine Sacramentary, the masses have direct reference to the protomartyr, except the eighth, which has no individual reference at all. It is important to note that the Preface in the seventh mass definitely places the festival of St. Stephen on the day after Christmas, shewing clearly that this mass, and therefore probably some at any rate of the others, are in their wrong place here, and should be transferred to December. It may be added that several of the prayers in these masses occur in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries under Dec. 26. The ninth of the Leonine masses refers to the dedication of a church in honour of St. Stephen, and the Ballerini (not. in loc.) suggests that the reference may be to the church on the Mons Coelius, dedicated by pope Simplicius (ob. A.D. 483). Possibly this mass properly belongs to Aug. 3.

In Mabillon's Lectionarium Luxoviense, a lection is provided for the festival of St. Stephen, ad Maximus, but relegated to the appendix as spurious, one for the festival of St. Stephen and the other for the Octave (Serm. 29, 31, in Appendix; Patrol. lvii. 905, 913).

^b This sermon is definitely ascribed to Asterius by Photius (Bibliotheca, cod. 271; Patrol. Gr. civ. 204).

^c There are also two other sermons attributed to matutinum, Jeremiah xvii. 7-18, followed by an extract from a sermon of Augustine. At mass, the lections are Acts vi. 1-vii. 2; Matt. xvii. 23-xviii. 11 (Patrol. lxxii. 174). In the Gothico-Gallic Missal is a contestatio or preface (the so-called præfatio being here the priest's first prayer) of unusual length, by which the minds of the worshippers were to be better fitted for the solemnity which was to follow. In this fact we may see obvious evidence of the importance of the festival (ib. 230).

In the Mozarabic Missal, the prophetic lection is not a special one, but serves also for the festival of St. Clement, Wisdom iv. 7-15; and for the epistle and gospel are respectively Acts vi. 1-viii. 4 (omitting vii. 2-51) and Matt. xxiii. 1-39 (Patrol. lxxxv. 190).

In the Greek church, the martyrdom of St. Stephen is now commemorated on Dec. 27, the festival of the previous day commemorating the Blessed Virgin and St. Joseph. The heading in the Menæa speaks of St. Stephen as the "holy protomartyr and archdeacon." The festival of the translation is held on Aug. 2. The notices for these days in the metrical Ephemerides prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May, vol. i., are respectively εἰκάδι λαΐνεος Στεφάνου μῶρος ἐβδόμη εἶλεν and δευτερὴ νέκυνς Στεφάνου γίνετ' ἀνακομιδῇ (pp. lix., xxxix.). The epistle and gospel for Dec. 27 in the Greek church are respectively Heb. ii. 11-18 and Matt. xxi. 33-43.

In the calendars of the Armenian church, published by Assemani (Bibl. Or. iii. 1. 645 sqq.), Dec. 26 is the commemoration of the martyrdom, and Aug. 2 that of the discovery of the relics. Jan. 7 is also a commemoration of St. Stephen, apparently of the martyrdom, which thus comes, it will be observed, on the day after that on which the Armenians still, alone among Christians, celebrate the Nativity of our Lord. [CHRISTMAS.]

In the calendars of the Coptic and Ethiopic churches, published by Ludolf, Dec. 27 is the day for the commemoration of St. Stephen, though the Coptic calendar adds the note "Finding of the bones of Stephen" (ad Hist. Aeth. Comm. p. 403). This, however, as we have already said, is obviously wrong. On Sept. 12, both calendars have another commemoration, specially defined in the Coptic calendar as the "martyrdom of Stephen"^d (ib. 391). On Oct. 14 is yet another, but in the Ethiopic calendar only (ib. 395).

3. Apocryphal Literature.—The council held at Rome in A.D. 494, under the episcopate of Gelasius, condemned among other books a "Revelatio quæ appellatur Stephani" (Patrol. lix. 178).

In addition to works cited in this article, reference should be made for the legend and festival of St. Stephen to Tillemont, Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclésiastique, vol. ii. pp. 1, 503. The Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists do not avail us here, not having yet reached beyond the end of October. [R. S.]

STICHARION or STOICHARION (σχιχάριον, στοιχάριον). This vestment is simply the equivalent in the Eastern church of the alb [ALB] of the Western church. Before citing any references as to its use, we must first speak briefly as to the word itself. The etymology must be considered doubtful. Goar (Euchologion, p. 110) derives it from στίχος, "ab uno quasi lineæ ordine," from the long unbroken sweep of the dress ("recta et longum protensa"). Ducange (Glossarium Graecum, s. v.) forms it from a word στιχίον, a tunic. There is no reason to doubt the bona-fide existence of this latter word, for we find in Hesychius, ἄβλον, ὄνομα στιχείου, and there are perhaps traces of a Latin word stica (see Ducange, s. v.) in the same sense; still it brings us no nearer the derivation. G. J. Voss (de Vitii Sermonis, lib. iii. c. 50) suggests that stica is for sticta, giving us the notion of a χιτῶν κατάστικτος. He calls attention in support of this, to the fact that the sticharia of bishops are waved in bands. Although the fact is certainly so, the roundabout theory of derivation must be pronounced absurd. Indeed it does not seem unlikely that stica may have arisen as a shortened form of sticharion. It is possible, however, that the sticharion may have received its name from the bands or lines upon it.

As in the case of most other ecclesiastical vestments, the word evidently represents in the first instance a dress of ordinary life. One of the charges brought against Athanasius was that he had required the Egyptians to furnish contributions of linen sticharia (Apol. contra Arianos, c. 60; Patrol. Gr. xxv. 358). As, in describing this incident, Sozomen speaks of χιτωνίαν λιγὴν φόρον (Hist. Eccles. ii. 22), and Socrates (Hist. Eccles. i. 27) of λιγὴν ἐσθήτα, we may feel pretty certain that we are not dealing here with ecclesiastical vestments properly so called. The same may be said of the references to sticharia in the will of Gregory of Nazianzum, who bequeaths to Evagrius the deacon, κάμασρον ἐν, στιχάριον ἐν, πάλλια β', and to the "notarius" Elaphius a similar gift (Patrol. Gr. xxxvii. 293). See also Palladius (Hist. Lausiaca, c. 136; Patrol. Gr. xxxiv. 1235), where Athanasius, on an attempt to apprehend him, catches up a sticharion and a βιβλίον and flees in the dead of night.

We must refer now to the word in its ecclesiastical sense. Here we find it for the tunic of bishops, priests, and deacons, as well as for subdeacons and for monks. The earliest reference with which we are acquainted, other than those in a Liturgy the date of the several parts of which must be considered doubtful, is to be found in Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, early in the eighth century. His account is, "And first the sticharion, being white, setteth forth the splendour of the Godhead and the glorious citizenship of the priest (τοῦ ἱερέως). The stripes (λαβία) of the sticharion which are on the sleeve (τὰ ἐν τῇ χειρὶ), do set forth the bonds of Christ . . . The stripes which run across, the blood which flowed from the side of Christ on the cross" (Hist. Eccles. et Mystica Theoria; Patrol. Gr. xcvi. 394).^a

^d It is all the more probable that this variation from ordinary use is simply an error, because in the Calendar of the Coptic Church, published by Mr. Maian, the entry for September 12 is "Removal of bones of Stephen, First of Martyrs and First of Deacons;" and that for December 27, "Martyrdom of the holy Apostle Stephen, . . ."

We gather from all this that the vestment was originally of white linen; though it is now often made of costly materials, and in Lent (except on the Annunciation, Palm Sunday, and Easter Eve) purple sticharia are worn (Codinus Curopalata, de Officiis, c. 9, in fin.). This is of course meant in sign of mourning.

The bands spoken of by Germanus may be illustrated by those found in early instances of vestments in the West [see e.g. DALMATIC]. It will have been noticed that Germanus referred to the sticharion without special reference to any particular order. The wavy bands are now, however, peculiar to the sticharia of bishops. For another kind of ornamentation see GAMMADIA.

The Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, at its beginning, gives the formulae to be used by priest and deacon on assuming the sticharion (Goar, p. 59). The same name, too, is given to the garment put on the subdeacon at his ordination (ib. 244). According to Goar, however (p. 246, n. 6), this is a tighter and shorter garment than that ordinarily so called. For an instance of the use of the term for the dress of monks, see ib. p. 484. Among the Syriac churches the vestment is known as koution, a mere corruption of χιτώνιον (Renaudot, Lit. Or. Coll. vol. ii. 54, ed. 1847). Among Coptic Christians it is known as jabat, or toumat, the latter obviously formed from the above Greek word (ib. vol. i. 161). See for further notices Ducange's Glossarium, s. v.; and Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. [R. S.]

STICHERA (στιχηρά). (1) Verses composed by ecclesiastical authority, and forming part of the Greek liturgical offices. (Goar, Eucholog. pp. 32, 206.) στιχηρά προσόμοια were versicles composed of an equal number of syllables, so that they could be sung conveniently to the same tone.

(2) Stichera Biblia was a name given to certain books of the Old Testament, in consequence of their metrical or poetical character, viz. Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles. (Greg. Naz. quoted by Ducange, s. v.) [F. E. W.]

STOLE (orarium, stola; ὀράριον, ἐπιτραχήλιον, περιτραχήλιον, φακεώλιον [Germanus, l. c.]; ἰσίδε). It is true that the word stole does not occur, in its technical sense, as the title of a certain ornamental Christian vestment, till after our period of the first eight centuries, but it will be convenient to include here under this head our notices of the various ornaments which, under whatever name known, may be grouped together as being but varieties of the same general type.

Before doing this, however, we shall briefly remark on the uses of the word stole (στολή, stola) itself, in its earlier non-technical meanings. In classical Greek, στολή is most often found in the sense of garb or equipment (see e.g. Herodotus, i. 80, ἰππάδα στολήν ἐνεσταλμένους), and also, though less frequently, with the meaning of an article of clothing, a single garment. This twofold use obtains also in the LXX. Here στολή stands for a variety of Hebrew words, but most frequently it is used for the priestly and high-priestly garments, both in the singular for the whole set of vestments (and that though the Hebrew word itself is plural [כְּתֹרֶת]; see e.g. Exod. xxviii. 2, 3; xxix. 21, 29, &c.), and in the plural, where reference is made to the component parts (e.g. Exod. xxviii. 4). The collective sense of στολή is not confined to the priestly garb, though this is the commonest use of it (see e.g. Deut. xxii. 5, στολή γυναικεία; Jer. lii. 27, τὴν στολήν τῆς φυλακῆς; see also Baruch v. 1). We may add that στολή is the word used for the robe put on Joseph by Pharaoh (Gen. xli. 42), for the "change of raiment" given by Joseph to his brethren, and that it twice occurs as the translation of ephod, David being the wearer (2 Sam. vi. 14; 1 Chron. xv. 27). The word will doubtless carry with it as a rule the notion of a long, stately dress, as may be inferred from the choice of it to represent the flowing priestly garments, though of course it is not meant to imply that the word per se will mean the priestly garb. Such is markedly its New Testament use (see e.g. Mark xii. 38; Luke xx. 46 [of scribes loving to walk about ἐν στολαῖς]; Luke xv. 22 [where it is the "best robe" brought forth for the prodigal], also Mark xvi. 5; Rev. vi. 11, &c.), and also that found in classical Latin, to which we shall presently refer.

In ecclesiastical Greek, the word, as applied to the garb of Christian priesthood, occurs exceedingly rarely.^a Theodoret (Hist. Eccles. ii. 27) tells of Constantine's gift of a ἱερὰ στολή to Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, where one would suppose the word to be used much in its old classical meaning. Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople early in the 8th century, speaks of ἡ στολή τοῦ ἱερέως as being κατὰ τὸν ποδήρη Ἀαρὼν (Hist. Eccles. et Mystica Contemplatio; Patr. Gr. xcvi. 394). This, it cannot be doubted, is to be taken of the phelonion, the vestment par excellence; indeed it may be noted that the orarium is afterwards mentioned and described, as we shall shew below. Again, in the still extant letter of the patriarch Theodosius of Jerusalem to Ignatius of Constantinople, at the time of the Fourth General Council of Constantinople (A.D. 869), when a present of the supposed ποδήρης, ἐπωμῖς and μίτρα of St. James is sent to the latter, they are grouped under the collective term of ἡ ἱεραρχικὴ στολή (Hardouin, Concilia, v. 1029).

In classical Latin, the stola was the characteristic dress of a Roman matron, as the toga of a citizen.^b It came down to the feet, ad talos stola demissa (Horat. Sat. i. 2. 99), and was generally edged with a kind of flounce (instita). The use of stola in the Vulgate version of the Old Testament is not of course specific, like this, but it generally carries with it a notion of stateliness. In the collective sense of the Greek word for the set of priestly vestments, it does not seem to occur. In the Vulgate version of the New Testament, stola is always the translation of στολή.

^b Very rarely we find the word used in connexion with men, e.g. of the priests of Isis (Apuleius, Metam. xi. 24).

^a Ducange (Gloss. Graec. s. v.) speaks erroneously of Germanus referring merely to the sticharion of deacons.

The technical use of stola for a stole does not occur before the 9th century,^c orarium being the current name of that ornament in the preceding centuries. Early in the 9th century, it would seem, the new name began to come into use. Thus Rabanus Maurus, writing about A.D. 820, speaks of the "orarium . . . licet hoc quidam stolam vocent" (de Inst. Cler. i. 19; Patrol. cvii. 307). Only a few years later, Amalarius speaks of the ornament as stola, and ignores the word orarium altogether (de Eccl. Off. ii. 20; Patrol. cv. 1096). In Walafrid Strabo's list of Christian vestments, however, in the middle of the 9th century, the name orarium alone is used (de Rebus Eccl. 24; Patrol. cxiv. 952). Long after this, moreover, the old name survived side by side with the new. Thus, in a statute of Riculfus, bishop of Soissons (ob. A.D. 902), enjoining a proper stock of vestments for priest and altar, one item is "oraria, id est stolae duae nitidae" (stat. 7, Patrol. cxxi. 17). Again, in a work once wrongly ascribed to Alcuin, but evidently written in the 10th or 11th century, we meet with the expression, "orarium, id est stola" (de Div. Off. 39; Patrol. ci. 1242), as though the former were rather a technical, the latter a familiar name. Writing as late as the middle of the 12th century, Honorius of Autun still uses the old word, "stola, quae et orarium dicitur" (Gemma Animae, i. 204; Patrol. clxxii. 695).

It may now be asked why such a word as stola, with its long-established meaning of a full flowing robe, should have been chosen to represent so totally different a thing as the narrow riband-like ornament which we know as a "stole." To this question no very satisfactory answer has been given. It has been suggested that the border was the only surviving element of the old stola, and thus inherited its name. This is the view of Durandus (Rat. Div. Off. iii. 5, 6), who, after stating that the stola was once a white dress coming down to the feet, adds, "sed postquam alba coepit portari, mutata est in torquem." With this, Bock (Liturg. Gevänder des Mittelalters, i. 437) agrees. It must be confessed, however, that this theory does not seem at all probable. Equally little does Marriott's view (Vest. Christ. p. 215) commend itself to our mind, that from the use of stola in the Vulgate it became especially associated with the idea of a priestly robe, and that perhaps the orarium, being in the 8th century "the special vestment of Christian priesthood," gradually acquired the name of the "stola," as though the vestment par excellence. It does not, however, seem to us that stola, as used in the Vulgate, has any special priestly connexion; and further, it is rather a large assumption that the orarium, and not the planeta, should be considered the typical Christian vestment.

Even after stola had assumed the special meaning of orarium, the old meaning was still retained side by side therewith. Thus, e. g. Honorius of Autun (op. cit. 216) speaks of the "best robe" of the prodigal's father as prima stola. Very rarely we find stola and orarium spoken of together, the former presumably in its early sense—"stolam cum orario" (Vita S. Livini, c. 14; in D'Achéry and Mabillon's Acta Sanctorum Ordinis Benedicti, saec. 2, p. 455).

We must now discuss the history of the earlier word orarium; and here, as with stola, the technical meaning is preceded by a non-technical one. Of this we have given one or two instances under the separate article, to shew that the non-technical sense still, as it were, overlapped the technical in Christian writers. We must now, however, carry back our examination a stage further. Much the most probable derivation of orarium is from ora, the face, but several others, some indeed very far-fetched, have been proposed, some from the Latin and some from the Greek. Salmasius (infra) derives it from ora, in the sense of border, "lorum quod ad oram vestis asseritur," much the same in fact as the instita of the stola. Another Latin derivation is from orare, seeing that the stole is always to be worn during prayer. Rabanus Maurus, and one of the canons of the Fourth Council of Toledo (infra), derive it from orare in the sense of praedicare, with reference to one of the special offices of the deacon. The advocates of a Greek etymology propose, some to derive it from ὥρα, because by means of it "is indicated the time of the different parts of the service," or because it is useful "ad ministrationem in horas;" others from ὥρατζειν, because the deacon is beautified with it (!); and others even from ὀρᾶω, because the sight of it shews whether it is the priest or the deacon who is ministering. A significant piece of evidence bearing on the question of the language is furnished by the Etymologicum Magnum, s.v. φάσσων, φασσάνιον (an Egyptian word, meaning a linen cloth), which is explained as σίνδων, . . . ἡ προσώπων τι ἐκμαγειόν. Λέγεται δὲ οὕτω καὶ ὁ παρὰ Ῥωμαίοις καλεῖται ὠράριον. More reasonable than any of these latter views is that first given, and we thus obtain the meaning of handkerchief, in the point of view of a primary use of wiping the face. Then, by a very natural extension, the word would become used for things like the handkerchief, strictly so called, but without any reference to the function implied by the derivation. Thus in this latter stage it would cover pretty much the same ground as the English word kerchief.

Our earliest examples are found in the Historiae Augustae Scriptores. Trebellius Pollio quotes a letter of the emperor Gallienus (A.D. 260-268) to Claudius, who afterwards succeeded him, in which he mentions the presents he had sent him. Among them we find "penulam [see the article] Illyricianam unam . . . oraria

^c There would be a much earlier instance than this if we could accept the judgment of the editors as to the date of an anonymous fragment concerning the vestments used in the Gallican church (Martene and Durand, Thes. Anecd. v. 99, cited by Marriott, p. 204). Here the vestment is called stola, the name orarium being altogether absent. Although, however, the date of this document is given by the editors as the middle of the 6th century, there seems every reason for putting it several centuries later. We may note here that the rule is laid down concerning the stole, that it is not to be worn in Lent, "pro humiliatione." Again, the word stola occurs in the technical sense in the Gregorian Sacramentary, but the form in which this has reached us is certainly too much modified from the original to allow of any weight being given to this instance in the absence of any evidence which could be adduced in support of it.

Sarabdena^d quatuor" (Vita Claudii, c. 17). The next emperor, Aurelian, was, as we are told by his biographer, Flavius Vopiscus, the first who gave oraria to the Roman people, "quibus uteretur populus ad favorem" (Vita Aurel. c. 48, where see the notes of Casaubon and Salmasius). This appears to mean that the people could by these indicate their applause in the circus or theatre, having previously been in the habit of waving their togas. Thus they would naturally be worn over the other dress. Marriott justly cites in evidence here one of the sculptures on the Arch of Constantine, where a number of the attendants of the emperor wear over their left shoulder a broad band or scarf (Vest. Christ. plate iv.). When we find that the earliest pictures of the ecclesiastical orarium (ib. plates xxviii. xxx. xxxi.) are, on the whole, similar to the above, the inference does not seem at all forced, that the Christian orarium, like the chasuble, the dalmatic, and other vestments, is but the old secular ornament, modified and adapted to its new use. The technical Christian meaning of the word then being thus formed, it speedily passed into Greek and Syriac; and indeed the earliest instance we are able to cite of this technical use is from the canons of a Greek council. Doubtless relevant to this matter is the question of the pallia linostima, which Sylvester, and afterwards Zosimus, is said to have commanded deacons to wear [MANIPLE]; and the papal pallium [PALLIUM] is obviously but another special instance of the general ornament. So too in the East we have ῥάβδιον, ἐπιτραχήλιον, ῥομφόριον; all of which, we do not doubt, are but modifications of one primary idea.

We must now trace the history of the orarium as a ministerial garment. In the West our starting point for such a history will be the canons of early Spanish councils of the 6th and 7th centuries, one of which furnished us with an important record in tracing the history of the chasuble [PLANETA]. In the Eastern church, however, the use of the orarium can be traced much further back. It is to be remarked, before entering on this discussion, that the orarium, having been originally merely a handkerchief, even though at times of a choice and ornamental character (from which species of it, indeed, the orarium, in the sense of stole, has sprung), still retained its ordinary, as opposed to its ecclesiastical, meaning, even amongst Christians, long after its ecclesiastical meaning had been formed. Of this we have already given some examples [ORARIUM], but shall again here cite one or two instances. Ambrose uses the word orarium for the "napkin" with which the face of Lazarus was bound (de excessu fratris Satyri, ii. 78; Patrol. xvi. 1396). We find it in Augustine for the bandage which binds up a wounded eye (de Civ. Dei, xxii. 7; Patrol. xli. 765). Jerome couples it with sudarium (Epist. 52, ad Nepotianum, c. 9; vol. i. 264). The Christian poet Prudentius says of the martyrs Hemeterius and Celedonius, that they sent up to heaven, as it were heralds, the one his ring, the other his orarium—"hic sui det pignus oris" ut ferunt orarium" (Peristeph. i. 86; Patrol. ix. 289; cited also by Greg. Turon. de Gloria Martyrum, i. 93; Patrol. lxxxi. 787). Indeed, nearly two hundred years after this we may still cite an instance. The four oraria which Gregory the Great sends as a present to Constantinople, together with two camisive, are obviously merely handkerchiefs (Epist. vii. 30; Patrol. lxxvii. 887). We must now proceed to speak of the orarium as a ministerial vestment.

The general result yielded by the whole series of early allusions is that the orarium might be, and was to be, worn by orders down to that of deacon inclusive, but below the order of deacons its use was prohibited. It thus becomes specially associated with the order of deacons, as the planeta with that of priests. Our earliest reference is to be found in the canons of the Council of Laodicea (c. A.D. 363), which forbade the use of the orarium to sub-deacons, readers, and singers. The latter are not to wear a stole when they read or sing (cann. 22, 23; Labbe, i. 1500). Again, in a sermon once attributed to Chrysostom, and which, though probably spurious, is not much later than his time, the writer speaks of the λειτουργοὶ τῆς θείας λειτουργίας imitating the wings of the angels with their λεπταὶ ὀθόνη, which are worn upon the left shoulder, the earliest trace of that which we afterwards find the universal custom (Parab. de Fil. Prodigio, vol. vii. 655). Much about the same time, Isidore of Pelusium speaks of the ὀθόνη with which the deacons minister in holy things (Epist. i. 136; Patrol. Gr. lxxviii. 272). It is true that per se the word ὀθόνη might just as well be a maniple, as a stole; but, in the first place, the maniple, as the word is understood in the West, is unknown to the Eastern church, and moreover in the preceding passage the ὀθόνη of the deacons are worn upon the shoulder. A very similar allusion to that of the Pseudo-Chrysostom is found in the account of Christian vestments by Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople (l. c.). Here the word ὀθόνη has been replaced by ῥάβδιον. We must notice, however, that whereas in Latin orarium means a stole, by whatsoever order worn, in Greek ῥάβδιον means the stole of a deacon, and ἐπιτραχήλιον is applied to that of a priest or bishop.

We shall next call attention to a series of conciliar decrees on the subject of the orarium, which, taken together, give us a pretty complete view of the state of the case. In the first instance, that of the Council of Orleans (A.D. 511), it is probable that the ordinary interpretation, which explains orarium in its non-ecclesiastical sense, is correct, from the company in which orarium here finds itself. The use of orarium and tsangae [TSANGAE], a kind of boots, is forbidden to monks (can. 20; Labbe, iv. 1407). Our earliest definite instances are drawn, as in the case of the planeta, from Spain. The Second Council of Braga ordained in A.D. 563 that, inasmuch as the habit had arisen among deacons of the province of wearing the orarium below the tunic, and consequently hiding it, so that they could not be distinguished from sub-deacons, therefore for the future, "superposito scapulae (sicut decet) utantur orario" (cap. 9, Labbe, v. 841). It is from the records of the Fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 633) that we obtain the greatest amount of information. One regulation passed here was to meet the case of clerics unjustly deposed from their orders. If a fresh synod reverses the sentence, they are still not to be considered to have regained their lost functions till they have received before the altar the external badges of their order from the hands of the bishop. In the case of bishops, priests, and deacons, one of these is the orarium. A subsequent canon of the same council forbids bishops and priests, and a fortiori deacons, to wear two oraria. The deacon is to wear it on the left shoulder only,^f and it is to be plain (purum), not ornamented with colours or gold (cann. 28, 40; Labbe, v. 1714, 1716). The Fourth Council of Braga (A.D. 675) orders that at the celebration of the Eucharist the priest should wear his stole (and only one) so that it should pass round the neck and over both shoulders, and form a cross on his breast (can. 4; Labbe, vii. 581). This regulation is quoted by Innocent III. (de Sacro Altaris Mysterio, lib. i. c. 54; Patrol. ccxvii. 794). The penalty enacted for disobedience is excommunication.

^d The meaning and spelling of this word is doubtful: one conjecture is Sareptena, from Sarepta, the Phœnician city.

^e The implied connexion here between orarium and os, as bearing on the question of derivation, will be noticed.

All this points to a well-established state of things, when even the manner of wearing the vestment is prescribed; and there is nothing unfair in assuming that it represents a long-settled usage. The reference also to stoles ornamented with gold and colours points to the same conclusion. As an illustration of this last point, we may cite the will of Riculfus, bishop of Helena (ob. A.D. 915), who, among his legacies to his church and successors, leaves "stolas quattuor cum auro, una (sic) ex illis cum tintinnabulis" (Patrol. ccxxii. 468). We may probably assume, too, that the omophoria and oraria, by presents of which, according to Nicetas Paphlago (Vita Ignat. Const., Patrol. Gr. cv. 572), the patriarch Photius signalled his restoration (A.D. 878), would be richly ornamented.

A number of later rules go beyond those we have already cited, and require at any rate a priest to wear his stole constantly. Thus the Council of Mayence (A.D. 813) directs priests to wear the stole,—"Sine intermissione . . . propter differentiam sacerdotii dignitatis" (Concil. Mogunt. can. 28; Labbe, vii. 1249), with the view of course of shewing at all times that he was a priest. This rule assumes a special form as laid down at the beginning of the 10th century by Regino, abbat of Prüm, to the effect that a priest on a journey shall always wear his "stola vel orarium" (Eccl. Discipl. i. 62; Patrol. ccxxii. 190).

Later notices of the stole, its ornamentation, and special rules concerning it, do not fall within our province. It may suffice to remark that even in the 9th century not only were coloured and ornamental stoles worn, but also the prohibition to wear more than one stole seems to have been disregarded. We find, for example, in the illustrations to the Pontifical of Landulfus, a MS. of the 9th century, that some of the priests wear two stoles, one of which is white, with black crosses, and the other gold-coloured (plates xxxiv.-xxxvi. in Mariott, taken from D'Agincourt, Histoire de l'Art par les Monuments).

^f The reason for choosing the left shoulder is given, viz. that, the right being free, the deacon may be able the more readily to hasten to and fro on his duties.

In the Greek church the stole is known by a different name, and assumes a different form, according to the different orders by which it is worn. Thus, as we have already seen, the form assumed by prelates is known as ὁμοφόριον [OMOPHORION], the stole worn by bishops generally and by priests being known as ἐπιτραχήλιον and περιτραχήλιον, the name ὠράριον being exclusively associated with the stole as worn by deacons. Into the case of the omophorion we need not again enter; the epitrachelion differs from the Western stole in that it is not thrown round the neck, but has a hole for the head to pass through and hangs down in front, though, from the seam down the middle, it preserves the idea of the ornament of which it is but a modification.

It may be convenient now, if we, at the risk of a slight repetition, indicate the various methods of wearing the stole characterising different orders in different branches of the church. In the Western church, the custom has been that priests, wearing the stole over both shoulders, should cross it on the breast, and confine it at the waist with a girdle; the bishop, who has his pectoral cross, allowing it to hang free, while the deacon has the stole hanging over the left shoulder and fastened at the right hip. As regards deacons, however, the present plan is an innovation on an older one, dating, it would seem, from the 12th century (Hefele, p. 191), before which time they appear to have allowed their stoles to hang down freely like those of the Greek deacons. Perhaps from the 12th century also dates the habit of deacons of the Western church of wearing the stole under the dalmatic. To do more, however, than just hint at this would be to go beyond our legitimate limits.

In the Greek church, the epitrachelion (worn by priests and bishops) practically forms, as we have said, one band, hanging down in front; and the deacon wears his orarium over the left shoulder, hanging down before and behind, thus justifying the simile of the wings. Among Syrian Christians we find a difference: here the stole is worn by readers (but among the Maronites only), hanging from the right shoulder; by sub-deacons (among the Syrian Christians generally), round the neck; by deacons, hanging from the left shoulder (as in the Greek church generally); and by priests, hanging round the neck and in front of the breast (Assemani, Bibl. Or. iii. 2. 797). It may be added that among the Nestorians a reader wears the orarium over his arms, but only at the time of his own ordination. Among the Malabar Christians, the vestment, as worn by deacons, is known under the name of orro, the shape being apparently like that of the epitrachelion, with a hole for the head (Howard, Christians of St. Thomas, p. 133). The vestment is known in the Coptic church under the name bitarchil, which is clearly a corruption of epitrachelion (Renaudot, Liturg. Or. Coll. i. 162, ed. Frankf. 1847). Among the Armenians it is known as poor-Owar, apparently a corruption of orarium; the shape, however, is that of the epitrachelion (Fortescue, The Armenian Church, p. 133).

In the work De Vita Eremitica, appended to the writings of Augustine, we find among the rules for clothing a direction that there be in use for both summer and winter "duae de stupacio camisiae vel staminiae" (c. 20, vol. i. 1390, in Append. ed. Gaume).

STYLITES. [Compare MORTIFICATION, p. 1319.] Solitaries, who made their abode on the top of a pillar (στυλος), received the name of στυλῖται. The first of these pillar-saints was Symeon, who in the early part of the 5th century took his stand on a pillar in the neighbourhood of Antioch, and died, after many years' exposure to the elements, A.D. 459 (Evagrius, H. E. i. 13 f.). His most famous followers were his pupil Daniel († 489), whose pillar was near Constantinople, and Symeon the younger († 596), who displayed himself, like his namesake, near Antioch (Evagr. vi. 23). [See their lives in the Dict. of Christ. Biogr.] A certain Alypius is said to have spent seventy years on a pillar in the neighbourhood of Adrianople (Surius, Nov. 26). The first Symeon's pillar was, according to Evagrius (i. 13), two cubits (about three feet) in circumference; and the saint abode seven years on lower pillars, and for thirty years upon one of forty cubits (about sixty feet). Another authority (Theodoret, Hist. Rel. c. 26) says that he took his stand at first on a pillar six cubits high, then on one of twelve, then on one of twenty-two, and that in the year 440 he was seen on one of thirty-six cubits. The supposed base of Symeon's pillar is still shewn at Khelat-Sema'n in central Syria, between the church and the monastery of St. Symeon (De Vogüé, Syrie Centrale, pl. 139, quoted by Martigny). So slender a pillar as Evagrius describes must of course have had some kind of platform at the top, probably railed, or it would have been impossible to avoid falling during sleep; but it is clear that the saint allowed himself no protection from sun or storm. In an ancient drawing figured by Martigny (p. 745, 2nd ed.) the saint is represented sitting in a kind of cup-shaped capital, while a figure below attaches a basket, probably of food, to a cord which he lets down.

The pillar-saints naturally found few imitators in the more rigorous climate of the West. A Lombard named Wulflac did, however, pass some time on a pillar in the district of Trèves, and quitted it at the desire of his bishop. He himself told Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. viii. 15) that he suffered horribly in winter from the cold, which had caused the nails to drop from his feet; and that the rain, freezing on his beard, formed icicles which hung down like a bunch of candles. SUBCINGULUM. [GIRDLE, p. 728.]

SUBDEACON (ὑποδιάκονος, ὑπέρτης; subdiaconus). At what precise time the orders lower than that of deacon were instituted in the church is a matter of complete uncertainty. The attempt to trace it to the apostles or their immediate successors is acknowledged by Cardinal Bona (Rer. Liturg. lib. i. c. 25, § 17) to be a failure. The most probable view of the case is that the growing needs and organization of the Christian community gave occasion to their institution and gradual and orderly development. "Crescente ecclesia, crevit officium ecclesiasticum: ut multitudini ecclesiae subveniri posset, adiunguntur inferiores in adiutorio praepositorum" (Amalar. de Ecc. Off. lib. ii. c. 6). And, after their introduction, an apposite precedent was discovered by later writers (e.g. Isidor. Hispal. de Ecc. Off. lib. ii. c. 10; Amalarius, lib. ii. c. 11; Rabanus Maurus, de Instit. Cleric. lib. i. c. 8) in the Nethinim of the Jewish church, though, with their ignorance of Hebrew, they strangely interpreted the word as equivalent to "humilis;" and, by a similar mistake in etymology, they considered Nathanael, the "Israelite in whom was no guile," to have been a type of the order.

St. Ignatius certainly makes mention of only three orders—bishops, priests, and deacons. In his Epistle to Polycarp, vi., ὑπέρτης means evidently a deacon. And so it is in Hermas, Vis. iii. 5. Beverege (Cod. Can. lib. ii. 4), after quoting No. 43 of the Apostolical Canons, argues that the office existed as far back as the 2nd century, though (he acknowledges) we can find no mention anywhere of its first institution. All that can be said is, with Martene (tom. ii. lib. i. c. 8), that it may have been of more ancient introduction than the other "minores ordines," and that it, as well as they, was instituted by the church in the 2nd or 3rd century.

Subdeacons are not mentioned by name in any Christian writings of the West till the 3rd century; e.g. St. Cyprian, Epp. 24, 28, 78, 79, 80 (ed. Benedict), and the Epistle of Cornelius, bishop of Rome, to Fabius, ap. Euseb. vi. 43: and in the Greek church not till the 4th century; e.g. St. Epiphanius in Exposit. Fidei Cathol. and St. Basil, Epist. Can. li. who calls the office ἡ ἀχειροτονητὸς ὑπηρέσα. Even then, and later, some uncertainty hangs over the time of their introduction into different churches, because other minor orders were included under the term deacon, after they were certainly in operation. E.g. Optatus (lib. i. p. 39, lib. ii. p. 53, as quoted by Cotelierius in his note on Apost. Const. ii. 25), "episcopos, presbyteros, diaconos, ministros, et laicos seu turbam fidelium": "cum sint quatuor genera capitum in ecclesia; episcoporum, presbyterorum, diaconorum, et fidelium." And so St. Jerome, on Isaiah xix. speaks of five orders in the church, not specifying subdeacons. In the Apost. Const. lib. ii. 28, the word ὑπηρέτης is used as an equivalent to διάκονος. In other places, e.g. iii. 11, vi. 17, viii. 28, it is used as equivalent to ὑποδιάκονος. This variation of meaning points to the probability of some interpolation in these passages; although the same variation of meaning can be exemplified from other writers.

The age for ordination to the subdiaconate was twenty years, according to the second council of Toledo, can. 1 (A.D. 447), and so the council in Trullo, can. 15 (A.D. 692). For the form of ordination, see ORDINATION, p. 1510.

In regard to his duties, the subdeacon was at first, no doubt, little more than what his name imported, one under the deacon, to assist the deacon. Special duties, however, were soon assigned to him. Such were, to supply water to the priest in which to wash his hands at the appointed time in the office (Apost. Const. viii. 11), a function elsewhere assigned to the deacon (see Cyril. Hieros. Catech. xxiii. 2). By the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 11) it is enjoined that deacons should stand at the door by which men entered, and subdeacons by that at which women entered, so that no one even of the faithful should go in or out during the recitation of the solemn part of the office. The whole of this duty presently devolved on the subdeacons (so Dion. Areop. Ecc. Hierarch. c. 5). In the acts of the Nicene council, part 2, were recounted the ἱεροῦμενοι, viz. ἐπίσκοπος, πρεσβύτερος, διάκονος, ὑπηρέτης. It was the province of the last to remain at the narthex of the church, and there to keep order as people went out and in; and not to depart from the door, till the service was over. By the council of Laodicea, cans. 20–22, a subdeacon is to pay the same respect to the deacon as the deacon to the priest. He must not have any place in the deacon's apartment, nor touch the sacred vessels. He must not wear an ORARIUM, nor leave the doors. This is again forbidden him by can. 43. Zonaras on these canons explains that the subdeacons were placed at the doors for the purpose of clearing out the catechumens after their part of the service was finished; and so to bring in, and shew out, the penitents, calling aloud to them to leave the church, and to the faithful to remain. They were not to leave the doors for the purpose of joining in the sacred mysteries, for that office belonged to the priests. Before the service they had to bring to the deacon the paten, to have charge of the bread for the oblations, and of the chalice; and after the conclusion, to convey them back again. In earlier times, the epistle had been commonly read by the lector, i.e. after the deacons had been appointed to take the gospel. The practice of the subdeacon reading the epistle cannot be traced earlier than the 7th century. Martene says it did not begin till the 8th century. Amalarius, at the beginning of the 9th (ii. 11), expresses his wonder how the subdeacons had come to read the epistle, a new practice which was then gaining ground. Other functions in detail fulfilled by subdeacons are to be found in Apost. Const. viii. 11, 12; Martene, sub voce subdiaconus (Ind.); and Bingham, bk. iii. c. 2.

In the church of Rome, as we learn from Euseb. vi. 43, the number of subdeacons was, and continued to be, seven only, in close adherence to Acts vi. In the church of Constantinople there were seventy.

The subdiaconi regionarii in Rome, of whom we read in Gregory M. (lib. viii. Indict. i. Ep. 14, p. 906, ed. Ben.), were appointed to attend on the priest, and on high days the pope himself, as he celebrated on the station days, to change his vestments, &c. Originally these were seven in number, then seven were added, and seven again, so as to make twenty-one in all; and they were placed under a prior (Ducange, s. voc.; Milman, Latin Christianity, bk. iii. ch. 7, p. 411).

At their first institution subdeacons were reckoned amongst the minor orders, as is evident from the council of Laodicea. From the writings of Gregory the Great, it appears they had come to be considered a sort of intermediate order. [ORDERS, HOLY.]

It is difficult to say when celibacy was first imposed on subdeacons. By the fourth canon of the first council of Toledo (A.D. 400), "subdeacons marrying a second time are to be reduced to the rank of porter or reader, and not to be permitted to read the gospel or epistle." From the thirteen canons of the council in Trullo, we learn that married men had been ordained subdeacons. Sundry epistles were written by Gregory the Great to subdeacons, from which we gather that the rule of celibacy was strict in Rome, but less so in Sicily, where Gregory made arrangements for a stricter rule in future. And as by degrees celibacy was enforced, so was the subdiaconate by degrees reckoned amongst "the holy orders": subdeacons could now enter the sacarium, and touch the holy vessels; thus innovating on the canons of the councils of Carthage, and of Agde (can. 66). (Cf. Greg. M. Epp. lib. i. Ind. ix. Ep. 44, &c.) [H. B.]

SUBINTRODUCTAE (συνείσακτοι, ἐπεισακτοι, extraneae adoptivae (Conc. Bracc. ii. iii.) called also ἀδελφαί, sorores, and ἀγαπηταί), females, not related by blood, who, under the plea of spiritual relationship, resided with the clergy, occupying not only the same house but the same room, and even sometimes, with perilous rashness, often productive of the grossest scandals, the same bed (Hieron. Ep. ad Eustoch. 22, de Virg. Custod.). These females were commonly some of the consecrated virgins of the church, "whom," in the words of Bingham, "they that entertained them pretended to love only with a chaste love." The suspicions, however, which this injudicious custom gave rise to were so grave, and the evils resulting so terrible, that the practice received the sternest condemnations of the church. How deeply it was rooted in human nature is evident from its springing up again and again in spite of ecclesiastical censures, and requiring to be repressed by repeated canons of councils. One of the earliest notices of this close intercourse between the sexes, cloaked with a religious sanction, occurs in the Shepherd of Hermas (lib. iii. simil. ix. § 11). The virgins of the vision invite him to stay with them. To his question, "ubi manebo?" they reply "nobiscum dormies ut pater, non ut maritus," which put him to the blush. He accepts, however, their invitation, and passes the night with them outside the tower, lying in the middle of the virgins on their "tunicæ lineæ," the whole night being spent by them in prayer. This passage, though, as Hefele remarks, inconsistent with the early date once assigned to the "Shepherd," proves the existence of this practice in the 2nd century. As early as the council of Elvira, A.D. 305, can. 27, a bishop or any cleric was forbidden to have any female residing with him except a sister or daughter, "extraneam neque quam habere placent" (Labbe, i. 973). The council of Ancyra also by its 19th canon, A.D. 314, forbade virgins to hold intercourse with males, συνερχομένας ὡς ἀδελφάς (Labbe, i. 1463). The third canon of the council of Nicaea was directed against this practice, forbidding any cleric, either bishop, presbyter, or deacon, to have any such female to reside with them, but only their mother, sister, or aunt, whose natural relationship would disarm suspicion, μη ἐξείναι συνείσακτον ἔχειν πλὴν εἰ μὴ ἀρα μητέρα ἢ ἀδελφὴν ἢ θείαν (Labbe, ii. 29). These "subintroductæ" were also condemned by the third and fourth canons of the first council of Carthage, A.D. 348, (ib. 715), the seventeenth canon of the third council and the forty-sixth of the fourth, as well as by the second council of Arles, A.D. 452, can. 3 (ib. iv. 1011); and of Lerida, A.D. 524, can. 15 (ib. iv. 1613); the first council of Seville, A.D. 590, can. 3 (ib. v. 1589), and the second and third of Braga, can. 15, and lex. 19 (ib. v. 838, 909), and the second (can. 3) and fourth (can. 42) of Toledo (ib. iv. 1733, v. 1716). The council of Antioch also, by which Paul of Samosata was deposed, A.D. 369, urged among the reasons for his degradation that his clergy had received into their houses "συνείσακτοι γυναῖκες, as the Antiochenes called them" (Euseb. H. E. vii. 30). In spite of ecclesiastical censures, however, the custom continued to flourish to the great scandal of the church and the demoralisation of those who adopted it. The frequency of the recurrence of its prohibition by the Spanish councils proves its prevalence in Spain, where it was practised by the Priscillianists (Braccar. ii. can. 15, Labbe, v. 838). How intolerable the practice had become is evident from several passages of the writings of Cyprian, who praises Pomponius for excommunicating a deacon who had persevered in it in spite of episcopal warning (Cyprian, Epist. 62 [4] ad Pomponium; Epist. 6 [14]; Epist. 7 [13]). The grossly indecent lengths to which it was carried by some called forth Jerome's most powerful vituperation (Ep. ad Eustoch.). "Unde in ecclesiis Agapetarum pestis introit? Unde sine nuptiis aliud nomen uxorum? Immo unde novum concubinarum genus? Plus inferam, unde meretrices univiræ?

Quæ eadem domo, uno cubiculo, sæpe uno tenentur et lectulo; et suspiciosos nos vocant si aliquid existimamus . . . cum in eodem proposito esse simulant quaerunt alienorum spiritale solatium ut domi habeant carnale commercium." And in his letter to Oceanus, de Vita Clericorum, he ordains that if any one after his warnings, "agapetas amplius quam Christum quaesierit amore," he is to be convened according to the rule of the synod, and the Nicene canons read to him. Among the letters of Basil is one to a presbyter, by name Paregorius, an old man of seventy, threatening that, unless he dismissed his "subintroductæ," he would depose him from his office, and if he ventured to exercise its functions he would excommunicate all who recognised him (Basil, Ep. 55 [198]). Basil's brother Gregory Nyssen also condemns those who openly cohabit with women, and give the name of sisterhood to such cohabitation (De Virg. c. 23).

We learn from Gregory Nazianzen that not only were clerics in the habit of having females to reside with them, but that ladies, who professed celibacy, also had their συνείσακτοι of the opposite sex. In his advice to virgins he says:

ἄρσена παντ' ἀλείνε συνείσακτον δὲ μάλιστα and he expresses his suspicion of this questionable relationship in the following lines:

τοὺς δὲ συνείσακτους ὡς δὴ φάσκουσιν ἅπαντες οὐκ οἶδ' εἴ τε γάμψω δώσωμεν, εἴτ' ἀγάμοις θήσωμεν, εἴ τε μέσονται φυλάξωμεν· οὐ γὰρ ἔγωγε καὶ με λέγῃτε κακῶς πράγματα τοῦ ἀίνεσθαι.

We see from the words of Jerome, "coelibem virgo spernit germanum, fratrem quaerit extraneum" (Ad Eustoch.) that this indecorous custom was also in vogue among the religious ladies of the Western church.

On his appointment to the see of Constantinople, Chrysostom found "subintroductæ" prevailing to the most scandalous extent among his clergy, and the unpopularity which culminated in his deposition and exile had as one of its first moving causes the stern determination with which he endeavoured to put them down, and the withering sarcasms he poured out upon them. It appears from the two homilies delivered by him, "de iis qui subintroductas virginis habent," that the clergy who adopted this practice degraded themselves into "cavalieri serventi" to their imperious mistresses, carrying their cushions, smoothing their sofas and easy chairs, providing delicacies for their table, and humouring their whims, to the complete disregard of their sacred character and the neglect of their clerical duties. The voice of the church having proved insufficient to repress the spreading evil, the civil power was called in to legislate against it. A law of Honorius and Theodosius II. (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. ii. de Episc. leg. 44; Cod. Just. lib. i. tit. iii. leg. 19) expresses its strong disapprobation of this "consortium sororiae appellationis," and forbids the clergy of any degree whatsoever to have any females residing with them, except mothers, daughters, and sisters, with a special reservation for wives married before their husbands entered holy orders, "quæ ante sacerdotium maritorum legitimum meruerunt conjugium." The words of the law are "quicumque igitur cujuscunque gradus sacerdotio fulci-untur, vel clericatus honore censentur, extra-neum sibi mulierum interdicta consortia cognoscant; hæc eis tantum facultate concessa ut matres filias atque germanas intra domorum suarum septa contineant." The practice, however, obstinately survived, and was repeatedly denounced by the ecclesiastical authorities in vain. The second canon of the council held at Rome under pope Zacharias in the middle of the 8th century repeats the old prohibition of the Nicene council, and, as subsequent history shews, with as little effect, "presbyteri vel diaconi subintroductas mulieres nullo modo secum audent habitare nisi forsitan matrem suam aut proximitatem generis sui habentes." (Bingham. VI. ii. 13; Bevereg. Pandect. tom. ii. annot. pp. 45-47, ib. p. 178; Muratori, Anecd. Græc. p. 218 sq.; de Synsactis et Agapetis; Justellus in can. 3 Nican.; Gothofred. Not. in Cod. Theod. 123, c. 29; Novell. 137, c. 1.) [E. V.]

SUBSCRIPTION. [SUPERSRIPTION.]

SUBSELLIUM. Other words used in the same sense are scabellum, subpositorium, suppedaneum (ὑποπόδιον), the last of which is exclusively applied to the support of the feet of our Saviour on the cross. They all mean a footstool or any rest for the feet; and from the earliest time persons of rank or authority are represented, when seated, as resting their feet upon a subsellium. This mark of honour, according to Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 16), was invented by the Persians. Homer gives a footstool to Helen and to Ulysses (Odys. iv. 136; x. 315). In Christian monuments this distinction is assigned to God when receiving the offerings of Cain and Abel (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, &c. cxxxvii.); to our Lord when seated and teaching his disciples (Perret, Catacombes de Rome, ii. pl. 24); and to the Virgin when the Magi are presenting their offerings (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, xl).

Episcopal chairs always had the subsellium, and Christians generally avoided the use of it as a matter of humility, and reserved the honour for bishops. In this spirit Jerome cautions Eustochium (Ep. ad Eustoch. xxiii.) (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v.) [E. C. H.]

SUBSTRATI. [PENITENCE, p. 1593.]

SUBURBICARII (EPISCOPATUS) or SUBURBICARIAE (ECCLESIAE). The earliest use of this term, in connexion with church history, occurs in the sixth canon of the council of Nicaea as given by Rufinus of Aquileia (Hist. Eccles. i. 6), decreeing that "the ancient custom" shall continue to be observed both at Alexandria and at Rome, whereby the patriarch (or metropolitan) of the one city exercises a general oversight over the churches throughout Egypt, and the metropolitan (or patriarch) of the other, over "the suburbicarian churches," "et ut apud Alexandriam et in urbe Roma vetusta consuetudo servetur, ut vel ille Aegypti, vel hic suburbicarum ecclesiarum sollicitudinem gerat" (Migne, Patrol. xxi. 225; Mansi, ii. 702). In the corresponding decree of the council of Chalcedon the same expression occurs: "Antiqui moris est, ut urbis Romae episcopus habeat principatum, ut suburbicaria loca et omnem provinciam suam sollicitudine gubernet" (Mansi, vii. 1127). It is matter of considerable dispute (i) as to what is intended by the above expressions, "suburbicarian churches," "suburbicarian districts;" (ii) whether the superintendence to be exercised was that of a patriarch or a metropolitan (METROPOLITAN).

(i) A decree of the emperor Julian affords further illustration of the use of the term. It says that the resources of the landed estates, whether patrimonial or copyhold, must be carefully preserved "not only throughout all Italy, but also in the suburbicarian territories, and in Sicily": "Non enim per Italiam tantum, sed etiam per suburbicarias regiones et Siciliam patrimonialium et emphyteicorum fundorum vires servandas esse perspeximus" (Cod. Theod. II. i. 9). Here it seems difficult to accept the view of Gothofredus (ad loc.) and Cave, that the "suburbicariae regiones" are those included in the district governed by the "praefectus Urbi" or "custos Urbis," a region which from the time of Augustus embraced a circuit of 100 miles' radius from Rome (Dig. I. xii. 1, § 3, 4; Gregorovius, Gesch. d. Stadt Rom. ii. 55; Gothofredus, Opera, Jurid. Min. p. 1320). The law appears rather to contemplate the divisions of the empire established by Constantine, according to which "Italia" would mean the Italian vicariate, which comprised northern Italy, the First and Second Rhaetia, &c.: in distinction from this the "suburbicariae regiones" would denote the ten provinces of the Roman vicariate, which were—1. Campania; 2. Tuscia and Umbria; 3. Picenum suburbicarium (so called to distinguish it from Picenum Annonarium in the Italian vicariate); 4. Valeria; 5. Samnium; 6. Apulia and Calabria; 7. Lucania and Bruttii; 8. Sicilia; 9. Sardinia; 10. Corsica. To this interpretation of the expression in the decree, the separate mention of Sicilia presents a slight, but by no means insuperable, difficulty.

Bingham, in discussing the above two interpretations, says, "either may be admitted, as having at least their arguments of probability to defend them" (Antiq. IX. i. 9). Ducange (s. v.) distinguishes between "suburbicariae" and "urbicariae," holding that the former term denotes the ten provinces, the latter the territory of the "praefectus Urbi." Baronius, on the other hand (Ann. 325, cxxxv., cxxxvi.), considers that these terms were of the same significance, and both denote the yet wider range of provinces bound by the "leges frumentariae" to supply the capital with corn at a fixed rate.

(ii) Bearing in mind the close analogy that existed between the political and ecclesiastical organisation of the empire, it seems difficult to suppose that the term "suburbicariae" could have been used in the church in a different sense from that in which it is employed by Julian; and we are thus led to the conclusion that the council of Nicaea recognised the right of the bishop of Rome to exercise over the ten provinces of the Roman diocese or vicariate a patriarchal authority corresponding to that exercised by the patriarch of Alexandria over Egypt. [METROPOLITAN, HOLY ORDERS.] That he already exercised immediate jurisdiction as a metropolitan over these provinces, and that this could have been described as "vetusta consuetudo" at the time of the council of Nicaea, is contrary to all probability (POPE, iv. 2). [J. B. M.]

SUCCECTOR (Latin, succentor; Greek ὑποφωνητής; Sicil. succiantro). It is not easy to say when this word or the corresponding office first came into use. But it was known to Joannes de Janua, who finished his Catholicon in 1286, for he describes it thus: "Qui in ecclesiâ post praecentorem sive principalem cantorem subsequenter canendo respondet, vel qui facit officium principaliter in choro sinistro." But although the word does not become at all common till later times, still it seems quite clear that it was known in early days; for it is named by St. Augustine: "Praecentor scilicet qui vocem praemittit in cantu, succentor autem qui subsequenter canendo respondet" (Enarr. in Ps. 87, 1). This is the earliest known passage in which the word occurs.

Some idea of what was meant by the term "succent" (succinere) may be gathered from the following passage, in which St. Basil describes the antiphonal mode of singing the Psalms in very early days:—"They sing them alternately, divided into two choirs. Then having entrusted to one to begin the tune, the others succent." (ὑπηχοῦσι, succinunt, Lat. Tr. Lj. 63 (al. 207) ad Clr. Nicaeas.)

The Greek word which is given by Ducange as the equivalent of succentor, is found in a passage of the interpolated epistle of Ignatius to the Philadelphians: τίς γάρ εἰμι ἐγὼ . . . ἀλλ' ὡς συστρατιώτης ὑμῶν, ὑποφωνητοῦ τάξι ἐπέχων (Oxon. 1644).

The passages already quoted point to this officer's duty of "succenting" in the service of the church. In subsequent times, when the office became a dignity in the greater churches, another character was superadded to him in that he was made the representative of the precentor in his absence. It is observed by Magri (Hierolex. s.v. Cantor) that in many churches of France a festival of the first class is called festum cantoris, because it then belongs to the praecentor (cantor) to arrange the service (officium ordinare); while a festival of the second class is called festum succentoris, because then the same duty falls upon the succentor. SUN (see MOON). Martigny states, on Bottari's authority (tavv. xxxii. lxxvi.), that the two colossal masks or grotesque faces, sometimes observed at the angles of ancient sarcophagi, are intended to represent the sun and noon. In this sense they have the same import of the seasons, as denoting the meting-out of human life. Such faces or masks occur, at all events, on the altar of the Basilica of S. Lorenzo fuori-le-Mura at Rome, which resembles an ancient sarcophagus in all its details of ornament (Ciampani, Vet. Mon. c. 1, tab. xlv. fig. 4).

The sun appears on the well-known Vatican sarcophagus, with the history of Jonah and the double sea monster (Bottari, tav. xlii.) with rays and a nimbus (see Parker, Phot. 2005). On a lamp referred to by Martigny in the collection of Sante Bartoli (Lucern. antich. part iii. No. 39), the sun and moon accompany the Good Shepherd, perhaps representing time and eternity, as is suggested by the Abbé Cavedoni (Ragguaglio delle Art. Christ. p. 32). Or they may probably be placed with the Good Shepherd, for the same varied reasons which account for their presence in so many of the early crucifixions. Either, which is possible, they denote the two natures of our Lord, or they give the idea of a presence and attendance, as it were, of the powers of nature at the central event of the world, and remind of the eclipse and darkness of that day. Both sun and moon occur, at all events, in the crucifixion of the Laurentian or Rabula MS. of Florence [CRUCIFIX, p. 515]. So in the 9th century MS. Bibliothèque nationale, No. 510). On the gates of St. Paul (R. de Fleury, ii. pl. 88), as angels. So in the majority of Saxon and Irish MSS.; on the diptych of Rambona, as half-length figures [CRUCIFIX, p. 515]; on the cross of Velletri (Borgia, de Cruce Veliterna), as faces; so also in the wall painting of the cemetery of pope St. Julius I. (Bottari, t. lxxii.). The torches borne by the figures of the diptych of Rambona are a singular instance of barbaric return to classical treatment, quite in keeping with the almost unique addition of the wolf and twins.

In the classical revival of Charles the Great and Alcuin, for such in MSS. it really was, the sun and moon become figures in chariots, the sun drawn by horses, the moon by oxen. The Bible of Ct. Vivian in Count Bastard's second volume, contains a beautiful example of Franko- or Anglo-Greek fancy [MOON]. In the MS. of Joshua, 7th or 8th century (Vatican; d'Agincourt, Peinture, vol. v. pl. xxviii.) the sun stands still as an 8-rayed star, and the moon on the other side. This had been long before represented in the 5th-century mosaics of St. Maria Maggiore at Rome. The Utrecht Psalter has a sun and moon on its frontispiece; at the heading of the Song of the Three Children, at Pss. cxxxviii. and cxliiii. as two heads, one wearing a crown of spikes or rays, the other a crescent; and in Ps. cxxi. they are represented as shooting "sharp arrows and hot, burning coals" on the false tongue. They are not present at the Crucifixion in Ps. cxii. [R. St. J. T.]

SUNDAYS, NAMES OF. [YEAR.]

SUPERHUMERALE. This word is primarily used in patristic Latin for the ephod of the Jewish high-priest, exactly translating the ἐπώρας of the LXX (see e.g. Exodus xxviii. 4, 6, &c.: Jerome, Epist. 64 ad Fabiolam, § 15, vol. i. 363; Bede, de Tabernaculo, iii. 4; Patrol. xci. 466; Rabanus Maurus, de Inst. Cler. i. 15; Patrol. cvii. 306).

The meaning of the word having thus been fixed, it seemed only natural to later liturgical writers, who saw in Christian vestments the reproduction of the Jewish, to find a Christian representation of the ephod, and to call it by this name. Accordingly the amice [AMICE] was often thus called (see e.g. Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. 39, Patrol. ci. 1242; Gilbert of Limerick, de Statu Eccl., Patrol. clix. 999).

The word is also used for the archiepiscopal pallium [PALLIUM], as by Gregory the Great (Reg. Past. c. 14; Patrol. lxxvii. 29; Epist. lib. i. 25; ib. 471 [a long quotation from the preceding work]; lib. vi. 64, ib. 848), and in the Collectanea of Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Relatio motionis in S. Maximinum; Patrol. cxxix. 610). In this last case the corresponding Greek word is ὠμοφόριον [OMOPHORION]. For further references see Ducange's Glossary, s. v. [R. S.]

SUPERPOSITIO JEJUNII. An addition of one fast to another, causing two, three, or sometimes even four or six days to be passed in total abstinence, was known in the Latin church by the name of superpositio jejunii, and in the Greek by ὑπερθεσις. Such lengthened periods of fasting were termed ὑπερθέσιμοι ἡμέραι, and the corresponding verb was ὑπερτίθεσθαι, superponere. This superposition of one day of abstinence on another might take place at any time as an act of extraordinary devotion, but it was most commonly practised in Holy Week, as a preparation for the Easter solemnities, especially on Good-Friday and Easter Eve, which were very usually kept as a continuous fast. This practice is called by Tertullian "jejunia conjungere" (de Patientia, c. 13), and "sabbatum continuum cum jejuniis parascenes" (de Jejun. c. 14). It is referred to by Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. xviii. c. 17) when he gives the ὑπερθεσις τῆς νηστείας τῆς παρασκευῆς as a reason for shortening his address, lest he should exhaust the catechumens. Epiphanius also, when speaking of the observance of this week, states that all Christians observed it ἐν ἐξηροφαγίᾳ, i.e. taking bread and water and salt, and that only in the evening, but the more earnest passed the greater part or the whole of the week in perfect abstinence: οἱ σπουδαῖοι διπλᾶς καὶ τριπλᾶς καὶ τετραπλᾶς ὑπερτίθενται, καὶ ὅλην τὴν ἑβδομάδα τινές (Epiphanius, Epitom. Fid. tom. ii. c. 22; cf. Haer. 29, Nazoraeor.; Constit. Apost. lib. v. c. 18). Dionysius bishop of Alexandria in his canonical epistle (can. i. apud Bevereg. Pandect., tom. ii. p. 3) uses the same terms, ὑπερτίθεσθαι and ὑπερθεσις when speaking of those who practise special abstinence during this week, some adding two days together, some three, some four, some the whole six, while some keep the fast of superposition only on the Friday and Saturday, and think they have done a great thing if they hold out till break of day on Easter morning. This continuation of the fast from day to day during Holy Week is termed by Sozomen ἐπισυνάπτειν τὴν νηστείαν (H. E. i. 11). As has been said, neither the term nor the thing was peculiar to Holy Week, but was applicable to any period of special abstinence. So Evagrius, speaking of the strict asceticism of the monks of Palestine, observes, οἱ πόλλας τὰς καλουμένας ὑπερθεσίμους πράττουσι (H. E. i. 21), and Victorinus uses "superpositio" of abstinence for two days in succession: "ratio ostenditur quare usque ad horam nonam jejunamus, usque ad vesperam aut superpositio usque in alterum diem fiat" (De Fabrica Mundi, apud Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 103), and in the Acta Martyrum Numidarum, c. 8, we find "continuatus in carcere geminis jejuniis." Such a fast was also called jejunium duplex, or duplicatum (Hieron. Epitaph. Paulae, c. 1). The prolongation of the Friday's fast through Saturday, which we learn from Augustine (Epist. 86), had become customary in his time in the church of Rome and in some of the African and Spanish churches, and was also known by the title of "superpositio." This double fast was, with the exception of the months of July and August for health's sake (Labbe, i. 973), enacted by the council of Elvira, can. 26, "Errorem placuit corrigi, ut omni Sabbati die jejunium celebremus," and can. 23, "jejuniorum superpositionem per singulas menses placuit celebrari." [E. V.]

SUPERPOSITIO SILENTII. This expression occurs in the de Poenitentiae Mensura of Columbanus, c. 5, 6, for the penance of total silence. [E. V.]

SUPERScription. The superscription and subscription of letters of ceremony early became in the Christian church, as elsewhere, matters of form and prescription. John the Deacon informs us (Vita Greg. iv.) that Gregory the Great in his letters used to address all bishops as "brothers and fellow-ministers;" clerics of other orders as "dearly beloved sons;" laymen as "dominos;" and laywomen "as dominas." He seems in fact to have used "dominus" and "domina" nearly as equivalent to the "sir" and "madam" of modern correspondence. According to the common forms of the Roman court, preserved in the LIBER DIURNUS, letters to the Byzantine emperor are to be addressed "Domino piissimo et serenissimo, victori et triumphatori filio, amatori Dei et Domini nostri Jesu Christi;" to an empress (Augustae), "Dominae piissimae filiae;" to a patrician, a "Comes Imperialis obsequi," an exarch or a king, "Domino excellentissimo atque prae-excellentissimo filio;" to a consul "Domino eminentissimo filio." This is so far in accordance with Gregory's practice that "dominus" forms part of all the superscriptions, to laymen given in the Liber Diurnus, but none are given to a person of lower rank than a consul. Probably the pope did not communicate directly with inferior persons. [LORD, p. 1041.]

* A specimen of this form of address may be seen in the letter of Pope Honorius, A.D. 634, to King Edwin, in Bede, Hist. Angl. ii. 17. Pope Boniface IV., A.D. 625, wrote to Edwin as "gloriosio regi" (ib. ii. 10).

The subscriptions given in the Liber Diurnus (lib. i.) are: to an emperor, "piissimum Domini imperium gratia superna custodiat eique omnium gentium colla subternat;" to an empress, "vestrae pietatis imperium gratia superna custodiat, domina filia;" to a patrician or count, "incolumem excellentiam vestram gratia superna custodiat, domine fili;" to a consul, "Deus te incolumem custodiat, domine fili." Of ecclesiastical persons, a patriarch is addressed by the papal chancery as "dilectissimus frater;" a bishop as "dilectissimus nobis;" a presbyter, or one of lower rank, as "dilectissimus filius;" while to an archbishop of Ravenna the superscription is "reverentissimo et sanctissimo fratri coepiscopo, servus servorum Dei." The subscription is in each case "Deus te incolumem custodiat," with the addition "dilectissimus frater, fili," &c. as the case may be. To the pope himself the superscription used—at least by the clergy of a sub-urbanicarian church—is "Domino beatissimo papae," or "Domino sancto" (Lb. Diurn. ii. tit. 1 and 3). [C.]

SWINE, MIRACLE OF THE (IN ART).

The only instance of a representation of this miracle (Luke viii. 27) given by Martigny is from a mosaic of St. Apollinaris at Ravenna, in which the possessed kneels at the mouth of a cave or tomb (Mark v. 3) and stretches out his hands towards the Lord, who stands before him, nimbed, while in the background the swine are rushing towards the sea (Martigny, Dictionnaire, p. 241, ed. 2).

SYMBOLISM. Σύμβολον means a sign by which one infers or knows a thing. It will apply in fact to any object by whose means we get a new idea of comparison, which is substituted in our own thoughts, or by general consent, for anything else; the substitution of a more obvious or familiar idea, drawn, written, or spoken, for a more recondite or important one, is necessary to human instruction or communication, in spite of all its various dangers of misapprehension or misapplication.

I. Symbolism of Decoration.—The idolatrous misuse of picture-symbolism within the body of the faithful itself, seems not to have affected the Christian church very severely for the first three centuries.

(α) The strong expressions of Tertullian (de Idololatria, iii.) are directed against paganism, and in his anxiety to prevent any tampering with it, he objects to all images and representations indiscriminately, and considers the painter's art unlawful. But it is evident that he virtually excepted the scriptural emblems, such as Clement's list (Paedagog. iii. 11, § 59; see GEMS, p. 712), and the figure of the Good Shepherd. He is obviously not thinking of them at all, and indeed has to make an exception in favour of the brazen serpent soon after one of his most sweeping statements. In the primitive church it was so practically understood as not to need statement, that images in painting or carving, made for the sake of conveying instruction, are an entirely different thing from images intended for use in prayer. The subject of IMAGES is already treated [p. 813]. The repugnance of the Jews to the use of images extended, after the time of the Maccabees, even to the making of the form of any living thing; and this would account of course for the strong feeling among Hebrew Christians against both symbolic and direct representation, if it involved the use of images resembling living beings in any place of worship. This prohibition has been adopted in its fulness by Islam. Again, recently converted heathen would often have nearly as strong a detestation of the idolatrous system which they had escaped from. Symbols in the second or a subsequent generation are apt to become, first, conventional realisms, then personifications, then idols. In the middle ages, the cross, from being in the 6th century the symbol of Christ's person, became an object of worship in itself, no longer an emblem of the life and death of God for man. This degeneracy of symbolism has exercised the church from the 4th century at least, and ran a parallel course in the Christian church and in the Hebrew. For as the Hebrews were always tempted to worship the images of the nations among whom they lived, so the Christians were tempted towards saint worship, as a traditional reproduction of the ancient Greek hero worship, or of Roman adoration of the manes. All mankind have a tendency either to turn symbols into images or actual fetiches, or to substitute beautiful personifications, or portraits of divine or sacred persons, for ancient conventional symbols of the entirely unseen presence of the Lord. Nevertheless, however dangerous tendencies may always exist in image-symbolism, carved or painted, very few systems of worship, Christian or gentile, have totally resigned its use. That the Hebrew dread of images in the apostolic days by no means prevented pious Hebrews from using picture-ornament is proved once for all by the Jewish catacombs (Parker, Phot. no. 1160, 1161). The seven-branched candlestick was painted in red or scratched in the mortar of every locus. One of them was adorned with human figures, flowers, and birds, including the peacock, afterwards adopted as a Christian image. The earliest part of this cemetery dates from the Augustan age, but part is as late as Constantine. The Christian pictorial or graphic system was a convenience of teaching. Those who could not read, and perhaps could not well understand the language used by oral teachers, had the pictures of our Lord, His miracles and history, to help them.

The pictures were understood by the brethren, if they conveyed no meaning to the heathen. The ancient family religion of Rome was domestic and ancestral, and the human symbolism of hope in death belonged to it. It held the spiritual expectation of another life, and of a retribution, illustrating both largely by emblem and sign in its tombs. The Roman-Etruscan reverence for the dead led them to pay great attention to their sepulchres; and the decoration of burial vaults in ancient Etruria, and also in pre-Christian Rome, bears important witness to the permanence of national custom, and the willing adoption by the church of non-Christian symbolism, if only it was not pagan or anti-Christian.

There will be found in d'Agincourt, vol. ii. (Architecture, pl. x.-xiii.) three illustrations with important bearing on this point. One is the interior of the tomb of the Scipios, long since discovered and despoiled under Pius IV. This has chiefly architectural or constructive interest, from its sarcophagi and loculi—the prototypes of Christian burial in after days. But the burial vaults of Tarquini, which accompany it, contain symbolisms of the gravest kind, asserting immortality and retribution. The soul is there, led away lamenting to punishment by dark yet beautiful Genii or Eumenides, its white guardian angels interceding. There are chariots of Day and Night, Seasons, and various other subjects known in the catacombs. There can be no doubt that this earlier sepulchral art, with its notes of future life and retribution, already naturalised and in use for centuries in Rome, made it easier for the early church to use picture-symbolism in tombs.

The relations of Christian symbolism to that of earlier religious systems seem to have been as follows:—Certain relics of Egyptian or Assyrian imagery, passed into the Hebrew system, were there found to lead back at length to the idolatry of the races who had first used them, and therefore, after the Maccabean dynasty, were rejected by the Jewish nation, though partly resumed in idea, and as pure symbols, by the Christian church. Such were the cherubic forms. Those of the lion, the ox, and the eagle have a Christian position of their own. A supposed permission of symbolic images and no more was inherited from the Hebrew church: the cherubic images and the brazen serpent being taken as precedents. But for nearly 300 years of its existence in Rome the church of Christ might be considered as a Greek colony, with cosmopolitan relations as well as Hebraic. Greeks were used to pictures everywhere, and would freely adopt and adapt the decorative wall-painting of their day. In the basilicas, or large halls of palaces where the brethren met for worship, there would then be symbolic pictures at an early date—principally the vine and the Good Shepherd, considered as painted texts of the Lord's words. But further, when we come to consider that the old religion of Rome was less mythological than sepulchral, and that its ancient Etrurian rites dwelt so much on adorning the tomb-chambers of the dead, it will be seen what special family-Roman reasons there were for the sepulchral paintings in the catacombs. The Etrurians had imaged an unknown life beyond the grave; the Christians set forth a known one.

The following is a list of the symbols most frequently represented in painting or sculpture by the church of the first seven centuries. Most of these are treated in separate articles, or under OLD TESTAMENT IN CHRISTIAN ART, or under PAGANISM IN CHRISTIAN ART.

Symbolic personifications occur not unfrequently in early art, especially in the MSS., and may be distinguished from pure symbols because they are in some degree connected with mythology; perhaps with idolatry, either as derived from it or leading to it. For instance, the frequent repetition of the figure of the river-god, Jordan, as in the celebrated Greek drawings of the Book of Joshua in the Vatican, in the great Venetian Evangelary, on the vault of the baptistry at Ravenna, and in the Benedictional of St. Ethelwold (Westwood, Palaeographia Sacra) are harmless relics of Greek personification. In the Greek 7th-century MS. of the Book of Joshua in the Vatican (d'Agincourt, Paint, pl. 29), the hill of the foreskins (Josh. v. 3) is represented as a young man, and the city of Gibeon as a woman with a face full of anxiety; not to speak of the frequent personifications of the church as an Orante, as Susanna, or even as the woman with the issue of blood. A picture of Night occurs in a Bible of the 9th or 10th century in the Bibliothèque du Roi at Paris, as a female figure in a dark-blue robe powdered with stars, and bearing an inverted torch. It is a beautiful reproduction of classical imagery, combined with Gothic colour and depth of feeling. Day and night, or the sun and moon, drawn respectively by horses and oxen, are found in the Bible of Charles the Bold (Palaeogr. Sacra). [PERSONIFICATION.]

The range of authorities on this subject is, of course, very wide. The best manuals, perhaps, are those of Alt (Heiligenbilder, Berlin, 1845), Dr. Piper's Mythologie d. christl. Kunst, and Merz's article, "Sinnbilder," in Herzog's Encyclopædie, Bp. Munter's Sinnbilder (1825) is strongly commended. The Abbé Auber's Symbolisme religieux is ample, and perhaps verbose. The author may refer to a book called Art Teaching of the Primitive Church (S. P. C. K. 1873). The proper authorities for the art of the Christian cemeteries will be found under CATACOMBS. Prof. Westwood's works contain many facts relative to MSS. Aringhi's index, in Roma Sotterranea, contains an excellent account of early Christian symbols, with quoted authorities, for the most part. Lord Lindsay's work, with references to D'Agincourt's plates, is an equally brilliant and accurate manual of Christian art and symbolism.

II. Symbolism of Construction.—Hitherto we have been considering symbolic ideas as conveyed by sculpture or painting. But we can hardly pass over the indirect or less demonstrable symbolisms of architecture, or the religious or spiritual meanings attached to styles and features. What spiritual ideas did, or do, certain styles of building, in fact, convey to a competent number of competent witnesses? and how far, by the builders and contrivers, were the styles or features intended to convey spiritual or any other special ideas?

In the first place, the church or temple itself is in all cases a symbolic object, as indicating an unseen object of more importance than itself. All its splendour, all its grandeur, is in the nature of things emblematic of a house not made with hands. Symbolisms of the altar, and all in which the idea of sacrifice is involved, are matter for the theological rather than the artistic department of this work. We are concerned only with the constructive form of sacred buildings, whether designed by the ingenuity or piety of the builders, or inherent in the structure itself. Decorative symbolism is an addition to structure, unmistakably planned and intended by those who paint or carve; while to a great extent constructive symbolism seems to depend on resemblances observed after the fact, and analogies which the original builders may not have thought of. The features of a building typify or indicate the needs for which it was raised, or in honest architecture they ought to do so.

The simple constructive arrangements of the earlier Greek temple, passing through all the vicissitudes of time, climate, barbarism, war, and peace, developed into the Christian, even into the Gothic church, by a steady natural law of progress, which some call decadence and others development. The essential parts are always the place of the god, and the place for his ministers, with space—"temple," or "enclosure"—around, roofed, unroofed, or cloistered, for his people to stand before him. In the Hebrew temple there was strict classification; all the chosen people were sacred, and had their exclusive court; and the department of the priests was divided between their inner cloister and the sanctuary where the ministering course were employed; but the Holy of Holies still remained, where the brightness of God's presence had appeared. The later synagogue has its choir, sanctuary, and symbolic ark or chest as a memorial of the ark of the covenant, occupying the Jerusalem end of the building, as the Christian altar is placed at the east. [ORIENTATION.]^e The construction of a Christian church then is in itself symbolic, like that of all other temples. The meanings attached to various parts of it, or to the horizontal or vertical style of its architecture, appear to have sprung up gradually from devout imaginations of various times. The form of the church is traceable in all cases either to the Basilica, or the circular buildings, baths or temples, of which the Pantheon is the grandest type remaining. The church, in the first instance, occupied the basilicas, or her builders adopted heathen construction, as they did heathen painting and sculpture. But they lost no time in connecting meanings of their own with the building and its parts. The ship-symbolism is fully carried out, when resemblances are contrived in the form and arrangements of the actual structure; and this is certainly indicated in the well-known passage from the Apostolical Constitutions. (Apost. Const. ii. c. 57, ed. Cotelier, tom. i. p. 263.)

There was an important symbolism connected with the crypt of the basilica, which connects the larger churches with the primitive worship and celebrations in the catacombs, and may probably be coeval with the Book of Revelation. The altar of a cubiculum was originally the table-tomb above the remains of a martyr [CATACOMBS]. It is scarcely possible not to connect this with the passage in Rev. vi. 9, referring to the souls of the faithful to death, who cry from below the altar; nor with the parallel use to which the crypt (or prison cell) of a Roman basilica was converted. In Christian hands the crypt became the tomb of the martyr or saint to whom the church was dedicated, and its altar was placed directly above his sarcophagus or grave. Lord Lindsay says the theory of an ancient church presumed it to be built over a catacomb, but it seems probable that the catacombs were often opened from churches or their area (see s. v.). An altar in later days could not be consecrated without relics.

The arch of triumph, between the central nave and the sanctuary, in the Christian basilica-church, was figurative of the transition through death, and the decoration of the apse and tribune are often clearly intended to give the idea of heaven or the apocalyptic Jerusalem, with the Presence of God [MOSAICS]. See Art-Teaching of the Primitive Church, p. 163, by the author of this article.

This is matter of decoration; and the constructive symbolism of the simple or Roman basilica goes no further. But in Byzantium, during the early splendour of Constantine's great works, the Eastern or absolutely Christian form of church was adopted, and the whole building made, as it were, emblematic from its foundations by being raised in the form of the cross. The cross is now combined with the dome; the form of the church commemorates the humiliation and sacrifice of God for man, while its central cupola involves all those ideas of aspiration and soaring victory which have since been claimed, almost as its exclusive property, by the northern spire, and campanile. The first and loftiest ideas of aspiration were given in strictly horizontal architecture by the Eastern dome and cupola. It is not pure vertical height which gives the idea of aspiration, it is the sweeping and climbing curves of arches or circles in perspective. Aspiring lines mean lines in which or by which the sight is led to travel upwards. The soaring effect of a Gothic interior, such as Westminster Abbey, is not conveyed by perpendicular lines, but by the perspective curves of piers and arches. The symbolism of aspiration has been worked out in the dome and cupola, as well as by the pointed arch and spire; and horizontal architecture is not necessarily grovelling, but adapted in the first instance to the uses of a hot climate, and capable of being adapted by modifications of the arch and vault to the needs of any climate. Without doubt the Eastern dome, rightly decorated, and seen from within, did and does seem, as Lord Lindsay says (i. p. 63), to expand into infinity like the vault of heaven. His beautiful corollary, that it is the emblem of heaven, as the cross-structure on which it rests is the type of suffering obedience, which in the end is built up or edified to reach heaven, is in the best and truest spirit of ancient imagery; and he adds, in a note, the remark that the roofs of temples, both Christian and Pagan, were frequently painted azure and powdered with stars to convey the same idea.

^e The introductory essay to a translation of Book I. of Durandus of Mende's Rationale Divinorum Officiorum, by Neale and Webb should be read by all who wish for full enumeration of symbolisms in church construction.

The elaborate symbolisms of pointed architecture are far beyond our period. [R. St. J. T.]

SYNAPTE (συναπτή, scil. δέσσις ἢ ἀίτησις), the Greek term equivalent to the Latin Collecta, Angl. Collect. The longer prayers in the Liturgy were called μεγαλὰ συναπταί, and the Shorter Collects in Terce, Sext, &c., μικρά, συναπταί, also called τὰ διακονικά, from their being generally read by a deacon or εἰρηνικά, from the pax vobiscum which preceded them. Synapte is properly applied to the series of short petitions which often occur in Eastern offices, and of which a Western example may be seen in the Ambrosian Missal (Domin. 2, edit. Pamel. i. 321, 328. The expression συναπτή αἰτήσεως refers to the frequent repetition of the phrase τῷ κυρίῳ δεηθῶμεν (Morinus, de Sacris Ordinat. p. 227; Goar, Eucholog. pp. 46, 47). [F. E. SYNAXARIA. [MENOLOGIUM.]

SYNAXARIA (συναξάρια). The lives of the saints as drawn up and arranged in the Menaea or other ecclesiastical books, sometimes extracted and published for convenience' sake in a separate form by themselves. [F. E. W.]

SYNAXIS (σύναξις). (a) A general name for a course of ecclesiastical offices, constituting the day-hours and night-hours of the church. Cap. vii. of the Reg. S. Columbani is entitled "De Synaxi, id est, de cursu Psalmorum et orationum modo canonico." Each separate office was also entitled a synaxis. Mention is made of a vespertina synaxis (Rule of St. Benedict, c. 17; Mab. de Lit. Gall. p. 109); a matutinalis or matutinatorum synaxis (Martene, Ampliss. Coll. vi. 384, Acta SS. Ord. Benedict. saec. iv. pt. i. p. 399); nonae synaxis (ib. saec. v. p. 15).

(b) A congregation or gathering of monks or clergy for any religious purpose (Cassian, lib. ii. de Instit. Mon. cap. 10).

(c) An equivalent term for eucharistia (Dionys. Areop. de Eccles. Hierar. lib. cap. iii.; de sacramento synaxeos sine communionis, et passim).

(d) In a non-technical sense in connexion with time; post unius anni synaxis, after the lapse of a year. [F. E. W.]

SYNCELLUS. Originally a monk occupying the same cell with another monk; subsequently a subordinate brother who shared the cell of the abbat, or of the bishop when the latter resided in a monastery, to be the constant witness of his manner of life and devotions, who by his presence might strengthen him against temptation and stimulate him to the practice of piety (see the authorities given by Ducange, sub voc.). In later times the term lost almost all reference to its original meaning, and became the designation of a high ecclesiastical dignity, the "syncelli" being the chaplains and confidential ministers, or private secretaries, of metropolitans and patriarchs, who very frequently became their successors. The number of "syncelli" of the patriarch of Constantinople attached to the church of St. Sophia was at one time very large, but it was reduced by the emperor Heraclius early in the 7th century to two. In public assemblies and synods the "syncelli" took precedence of the metropolitans, which, according to a passage cited by Suicer, once gave rise to an unseemly squabble at the Pentecostal celebration (Codin. Curopol. p. 112, ed. Bonn). The chief of the "syncelli" at Constantinople was called πρωτοσύγκελλος τῆς μεγάλης ἐκκλησίας, corrupted into πρωτοσύγγελλος (Liturg. Chrys.); he ranked next to the patriarch, whose spiritual director he was, and whose confessions he heard. He had rooms in the archiepiscopal palace, or when the patriarch resided in a monastery, a cell adjacent to that occupied by him. Cedrenus states that the "protosyncellus" before his time had usually succeeded to the patriarchal throne on its vacancy. SYNTHRONUS (σύνθρονος). The name given to the chancel seats round and behind the altar in the Greek church, in use by the officiating clergy during the Liturgy, &c. The Thronos, or chief seat, the bishop's throne, occupied the central and easternmost position behind the altar. It is marked G on the ground plan of the church exhibited in Goar's Eucholog. p. 13. SYNTYCHE, July 22, Phil. iv. 4; commemorated at Philippi (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker.). [C. H.]

SYRINX. As in numberless instances in ancient Pagan art the pipe is the regular accompaniment of the shepherd, so the Good Shepherd is, in Christian art, often represented with a pipe of seven reeds or straws. Sometimes he is holding it in his hand (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, lxxviii. cv. cix.), sometimes he holds it to his mouth (Perret, Cat. de Rome, v. pl. lxxviii.), sometimes it hangs on his arm (Bott. clxix.), or at his side, suspended by a strap over the shoulder (ib. clxxiv.); again, it is to be seen lying at his side, as on a fragment of ancient glass in the collection of Buonarroti (Osservazioni, &c. tav. v. 2).

This primitive musical instrument, with which shepherds were supposed to call back their flocks to the fold, like other pastoral emblems, soon began to be used in an allegorical sense by the early fathers. Thus Gregory Nazianzen (Or.

28, 43), after describing the anxiety of a shepherd, who, mounted on an eminence, fills the air with the melancholy strains of his pipe, recommends the spiritual pastor to follow his example and try to win souls to God by persuasion rather than by force, to use the pipe rather than the staff (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v.). [E. C. H.]

SYROPHOENICIAN, THE (IN ART). The Syrophoenician supplicating the Lord to heal her daughter (Matt. xv. 21 ff.; Mark vii. 24 ff.) is thought to be represented in a bas-relief of a sarcophagus from the Vatican cemetery (Bosio, Roma Sott. p. 65; Martigny, p. 162, 2nd ed.). The woman, represented of small size, kisses the hand of the Lord, while an apostle behind her lays his hand on her shoulder. The identification of this figure with the woman of Canaan is however by no means certain (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Chananéenne). [C.]

TABITHA (IN ART). The subject of the resurrection of Tabitha is not to be found, as far as is known, on any Roman monument, but two instances occur in France. One of these is on a sarcophagus, supposed to be of Sidonius, bishop of Aix, seemingly as early as the 4th century, and still existing in the crypt of St. Madeleine at the abbey of St. Maximin (Monum. relat. à St^e Madeleine, t. i. col. 767). In agreement with the Scriptural account, St. Peter is represented standing and holding out his hand to Tabitha. The bed on which she is represented sitting up is furnished with curtains suspended by rings from a rod, and near it two children of unequal height kneel and extend their hands to the apostle in token of gratitude. On the other side of the bed is a front view of two female figures in a dress very like that of modern nuns, which is supposed to have been the dress of widows in the earliest Christian times. These two figures are of course intended for the widows spoken of in Acts ix. 39. The other instance referred to repeats all the features of the one already described, and is to be seen on a tomb in the museum of Arles, No. 70. The same subject is also found on a sarcophagus in the cathedral of Fermo, with this difference of treatment, that all the persons represented are taken from the Acts of the Apostles, and are in some way connected with the life of St. Peter. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v.) [E. C. H.]

TABULARIUM. A name sometimes given to the muniment-room of a church in which the archives were kept. It was ordered in the legislation of Justinian, and afterwards in that of Charlemagne, that documents of special importance should be deposited in the tabularia of churches. (T. Eckhart, Schediasma de Tabulariis Antiquis, 1717; J. C. Beheim, de Archivis sive Tabulariis Vet. Christian. Altorf. 1722.) [C.]

TARRAGONA, COUNCILS OF (TARRACONSIA CONCILIA). Only two fall within our limits.

1. A.D. 464, to censure Silvanus, bishop of Calahorra, for ordaining out of his diocese; and to appoint to the see of Barcelona, then vacant. The alleged letters from this council to pope Hilary have been noticed under an alleged Roman synod of the year following (Mansi, vii. 957).

2. A.D. 516, when thirteen canons on discipline were passed, to which ten bishops under John, bishop of Tarragona, subscribed. (Id. viii. 539-46.) [E. S. Ff.]

TARSUS, COUNCILS OF (TARSENSIA CONCILIA), A.D. 431 and 435. The first when several bishops returning from Constantinople met and deposed St. Cyril and the seven bishops who had been sent thither from the council of Ephesus against the Easterns (Mansi, v. 1147); the second when Helladius, metropolitan of Tarsus, and several of his suffragans, gave their adhesion to the peace made between John of Antioch and St. Cyril, and anathematised Nestorius. TECLA. [THECLA.]

TE DEUM. The history of this wondrous hymn is obscure. Although no version of it in Greek has as yet been met with, there can be little doubt that large portions of it were drawn from Greek or Oriental sources. Taking our modern version as our text, we shall find that it consists of twenty-nine clauses. Of these the first ten are closely connected with the Eucharistic hymn of the liturgy of Jerusalem. We find the germ of the next three in the Morning Hymn of the Alexandrine manuscript. Of the last nine clauses those numbered 22, 23, are to be found in Psalm xxvii. 9 (Vulg. or Septuagint). The next three are found in the Morning Hymn above referred to; 27 is identical with Psalm cxiii. 3; 29 is clearly derived from Psalm xxi. 6.

The conclusion of the hymn varies from our received text in three series of important manuscripts. In one manuscript, which probably survived the sack of a French monastery, and, after being purchased by Queen Christina of Sweden, was given by her to the library of the Vatican (Reg. xi. or Vat. Alex. xi.), we have the following clauses: "Benedictus es Domine Deus patrum nostrorum et laudabile et gloriosum nomen tuum in aeternum. Dignare die ista sine peccato nos custodire." In another MS. at the Vatican, No. 82, we have nearly the same clause: "Benedictus es Domine," &c. We may compare this, together with the clauses 24, 25, 26 still remaining in our version with the following portion of the Alexandrine hymn, and the comparison will shew convincingly what is the origin of these clauses:—

καθ' ἐκάστην ἡμέραν εὐλογῶσθε
καὶ αἰνέσω τὸ ὄνομά σου εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα καὶ εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ αἰῶνος.
καταξέωσιν κύριε καὶ τὴν ἡμέραν ταύτην ἀναμαρτήτους φυλαχθῆναι ἡμᾶς.

εὐλογητὸς εἰ κύριε ὁ Θεὸς τῶν πατέρων ἡμῶν καὶ αἰνετὸν καὶ δεδωσμένον τὸ ὄνομά σου εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας. Ἀμήν.

It will have been seen that there are four different conclusions to this hymn. Speaking generally, all the copies are the same up to and including our clause 21; but the Vatican MS. 82 (a Roman psalter), after 21, has only 24, 25, 22, 23, concluding with the Benedictus es, as above. That is, it omits altogether 26, 27, 28, 29, and so far severs itself from the Greek hymn. The Vat. Alex. xi. a magnificent psalter, containing the versio Hebraica of Jerome, omits in the Te Deum clauses 24, 25, 28, 29, and reads thus: 22, 23, Benedictus es, 26, 27. A third version was current in Ireland. In the hymn-book edited by Dr. Todd for the Irish Archaeological and Celtic Society, p. 194, and in the hymn contained in the Antiphony of Bangor (now one of the treasures of the library at Milan) the order is 22, 23, 24, 25, 28. They leave out 26, 27, 29. These versions are introduced by the words "Laudate pueri Dominum; laudate nomen Domini" (see the Bangor Antiphony, in Migne, 72, p. 587). These last verses precede the hymn also in the copy contained in the Isidore MS. now in the Franciscan convent at Dublin. At the end of the copy in Dr. Todd's Book of Hymns, p. 19, is the following:

"Te Patrem adoramus eternum; te sempiternum filium invocamus; teque spiritum sanctum in una diuinitatis substantia manentem confitemur. Tibi uni Deo in Trinitate debitas laudes et gratias referemus ut te incessabili uoce laudare mereamur per eterna secula." These words also occur in the Franciscan MS., but they are not arranged in verses in the Irish hymn-book. The order in the Bangor Antiphony is the same as in the Irish hymn-book. According to Muratori, the "Te Patrem adoramus" is not found in this Antiphony; but towards the end of the MS. there are some curious fragments sewn together (not noticed by Muratori), amongst which the above address to the Holy Trinity is inserted, and also another, which is identical with it as far as the word confitemur, and then proceeds:—

"Tibi Trinitas laudes et gratias referemus; tibi uni Deo incessabilem dicimus laudem; te patrem ingenitum, te filium unigenitum, te spiritum sanctum a patre [et filio is added in the margin] procedentem corde credimus; tibi inaestimabili incomprehensibili omnipotenti deo qui regnas in aeternum."

The result of this investigation seems to be that the Te Deum, even in its earliest form, was regarded, like the Morning Hymn of the Alexandrine MS., as a hymn sung to the Holy Trinity, even though the work of our Lord predominates in its latter clauses.

The earliest notice of it that has been discovered is in the Rule of Caesarius (about A.D. 527). According to it on every Sunday there were to be first six missae or prayers; these finished, the Matins were to follow. Exaltaio te (Psalm cxlv.); then Confitemini (cxxxvi. (?); then Cantemus Domino (the canticle in Exodus xv.); Lauda, anima mea (Psalm cxlvi.); Benedictio (the Benedicite omnia opera Domini Dominum); then Laudate Dominum de caelis (Psalm cxlviii.); Te Deum laudamus, Gloria in excelsis, and the Capitellum. The Rule of Aurelian was somewhat similar. Columbanus, who was connected with the Irish Bangor, and founded the monastery of Bobio, where the Bangor Antiphony came from, does not mention the canticles or Te Deum in his rule; but it is worthy of notice that this Antiphony gives the hymns Canticum, Cantemus Domino, Benedictio trium puerorum, Benedicite, "Hymnus in die Dominico", Laudate pueri Dominum; laudate nomen Domini; Te Deum laudamus" in the order of the rule of Caesarius. Only the introduction to the Te Deum is furnished by the two verses of Psalm cxii. instead of Psalm cxlviii.: the same two verses which precede the Te Deum in the two Irish hymn-books.

Towards the end of the Bangor Antiphony, as given by Muratori, are series of five or six sets of short prayers to be used after the Canticum, after the Benedicite, after the Laudate Dominum de caelis, and after the gospel. Internal evidence shews that the Laudate Dominum de caelis included here the Te Deum; and the prayers furnish a beautiful illustration of the Rule of Caesarius.

Columbanus died about 615, Caesarius about 542, but there is one expression in the Te Deum which seems to carry us back to an earlier date. We refer to the phrase "suscepisti hominem," for such was the universal reading until Abbo of Fleury altered it to "susceptorum." There are two readings of the verse. The two Irish manuscripts read, "Tu ad liberandum mundum suscepisti hominem." All the other old copies which have been examined omit the word "mundum." In either case the verse means, "Thou didst take upon thee man" or "a man" either "to deliver him" or "to deliver the world." The phrase "suscepit hominem" was current in the time of St. Augustine, but went out of favour after the Nestorian controversy; it gave way to the phrase "adsumpsit humanitatem" or "humanum naturam." (We find the words "ad liberandos homines" as describing one object of our Lord's Incarnation in Augustine's letters No. 137, § 11). We conceive that so far there is sufficient evidence that the words of the hymn may date from the time of St. Augustine.

The titles which we find prefixed to the hymn in various psalters are interesting in themselves, and may perhaps throw some light upon the localities where these psalters were written. The hymn is not found in the oldest psalters, as in those at Bamberg and Verona and the original Vespasian A 1 (which no doubt belonged to St. Augustine's monastery, Canterbury, and which was placed in a kind of recess or shelf over the high altar on the supposition that Augustine brought it from Rome, a present from Gregory the Great), or the original Galba A, xviii. It is found in several psalters written in the 9th century. The title "Hymnus in die Dominica ad matutin" or "ad matutin, in die dominica" is prefixed to it in Marinus' psalter at C. C. C. Cambridge (No. 272); in the beautiful psalter of Charles the Bald at Paris; one at St. Gall, 15; another at C. C. C. 411; and the second part of Galba A, xviii. In the beautiful volume at Oxford, Douce, 59, it is entitled "Hymnus in die Dominica." In the latter part of Vespasian A 1, in Claudius C. vii. (the Utrecht psalter), Harleian 2904, and the quadripartite psalter at Bamberg it is called simply "Hymnus" or "Ymnus in matutinis," or otherwise to the same effect. In the last-named psalter there is an attempt at a Greek version as far as clause 12, when it ceases. In St. Gall 20 we find the words "hymnus domin. pro noct. hoc est ante lectionem evangelii," and in Arundel 155, "hymnus dom. nocturna laud. can." In the former as well as in St. Gall 23 (Folkard's magnificent psalter), the words "Te deest laus, te deest ymnus, tibi gloria, domine, patri et filio et spiritui sancto in saecula saeculorum. Amen," are at the end of the hymn. In what is called Bacon's psalter in the Cambridge University Library it is entitled "Hymnus optimus." In Reg. 2 B. v. at the British Museum "oratio pura cum laudatione." In St. John's College, Cambridge, c. 15, "laus angelica." Then we come to a series in which the title is prefixed, "hymnus quem S. Ambrosius et S. Augustinus inuicem considerunt." This is found in Vienna, 1861 (the famous psalter said to have been sent by Charlemagne to Hadrian: Daniel "confesses that he had always suspected that additions were made at the end of this psalter by a later hand"), Vitellius E. xviii.; St. Gall 23 (Folkard's) and 27. This or some equivalent title prevailed in later years. In a psalter at Salzburg, A. v. 34, "hymnus Augustini." In several notable psalters such as that in the great

Venice Bible and Paris 13,159, C. C. C. 391, Lambeth 197, Salzburg A. v. 30, there is no title prefixed. The Irish book of hymns has "haec est laus sanctae Trinitatis quam Augustinus sanctus et Ambrosius composuit." Archbishop Ussher seems to have seen two manuscripts in which the composition was ascribed to one Nicetus: one was in the Cotton Library. Such a volume cannot now be found, but in the Norfolk Library, now in the British Museum, "Arundel 60," the hymn is introduced thus, "YM̃H SCI VICETI EPI DIEB; DOMIN. AD MATUT." and there are two MSS. at Florence, Plut. xvii. Cod. iii. and viii. where nearly the same words are found. Elsewhere (see Oudin, t. i. p. 668) it is described as "Sisebuti," "Sisebuti monachi," "S. Abundii;" these probably are phonetic spellings of the same name.

These memoranda may possibly assist in the effort to trace these manuscripts to their original sources or to the localities where they were used. Many of the titles agree with the account given in the rules of Caesarius, Aurelian, and Benedict. In this last the Te Deum preceded the lesson from the Gospel, the Te decet followed it on the vigils of the Sundays. The change from mattins to nocturns is interesting. Of course the service was the same, though the name was altered. It is also interesting to notice that in the 7th century, as now, the Te Deum preceded the lesson from the Gospel.

The words "Te gloriosus apostolorum chorus" have recalled to many minds the beautiful passage at the end of Cyprian's treatise de Mortalitate, "illic apostolorum gloriosus chorus, illic prophetarum exultantium numerus, illic martyrum innumerabilis populus."

The Te Deum laudamus is mentioned twice by Alcuin in his book de Psalmorum usu (Migne, 101, pp. 468, 469). It is entitled Hymnum dominicale, p. 592. But the text has been modernized in the "suscepisti." [C. A. S.]

TELEPTE, COUNCIL OF (TELEPENSE, TELENSE, or ZELLEENSE CONCILIU), A.D. 418. We have ten canons attributed to this council by Ferrandus, and nine, by no means identical with them, in a letter of pope Siricius, said to have been recited at it. There are several expressions in both calculated to suggest doubts of their authenticity; nor was it Siricius, but Zosimus, who was then pope; nor, again, is this alleged letter of his found in the Dionysian collection; nor are the marginal references to this letter in Ferrandus of any value, as Ferrandus all through quotes the exact words of the council, and never of the pope, where the two differ; see ROME, COUNCILS OF, A.D. 386. (Mansi, iv. 379-82; comp. Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 473.)

TELESPHORUS (THELESPHORUS), pope, martyr, Jan. 5 (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Wand.); Jan. 2 (Flor., Notker.). [C. H.]

et Responsa ad Orthodoxos, long ascribed to Justin, makes it identical with tempestarius. "How is it," his querist demands, "that they who are called νεφοδιῶκται contrive by means of certain invocations to send hail and excessive rains wherever they please" (Qu. 31). The reply denies that any have such power; but this remnant of heathen superstition prevailed widely among all classes of Christians from the 4th century downwards. A law of Constantius, 357, declares that there were "many who dared to disturb the elements by magic arts" (Codex Theodos. ix. 16, v.). The offence, which seems to have been more common in France than anywhere else, is frequently mentioned in the Carolingian laws (Carol. M. 789, Capit. i. 63 (Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 62); id. 805, Capit. ii. 25 (C. R. F. vi. 374)). A law of the Visigoths tells us that "immissores tempestatum" were "reported by means of certain incantations to send hail on the vineyards and crops" (Lex Visig. vi. 2, § 3). Agobard, 813, who wrote a tract on the subject, declares that almost every one in his part of France, of whatever condition, believed in their power, and that a storm ascribed to it was commonly called "aura levatitia" (Contra insulsa Vulgi Opinionem de Grandine et Tonitruis, 1, 12, 14). They also believed in a country called Magonia, from which ships came to the earth in the storm clouds, whose sailors bought of the tempestarii the fruits and corn that appeared to perish here (2). This imaginary crime is punished by the Greek council in Trullo (u. s.) with six years' penance. Latin penitentials assign seven to it (Halitgar, Poen. Rom. c. 5; Cumeanus Hyens,* A.D. 630, de Mensur. Poenit. 7; Theodor. Cant. Poenit. 356, p. 73, Par. 1677); the old Gallican adds that three of the seven are to be on bread and water (Mus. Ital. i. 393).

TEMPLUM for a Christian church. In the Christian writings of the first three centuries "templum" maintains its pagan meaning, and is scarcely ever used to denote a Christian church. Wherever vaos or "templum" occur with a Christian reference it is almost universally in a metaphorical sense. In the passage from Ignatius (ad Magnes. c. 7) πάντες οὖν ὡς εἰς ἓνα ναὸν συντρέχετε Θεοῦ, ὡς ἐπὶ ἐν θυσιαστήριον, the local reference which cannot be ignored is subordinate to the spiritual. The early fathers are unanimous in spiritualising the idea of a temple, and applying it to the heart of the Christian. Thus Barnabas in answer to the inquiry whether the temple of God still exists, replies that it does, but it is the heart of Christian πνευματικὸς ναὸς οἰκοδομοῦμενος τῷ Θεῷ (Epist. c. 16); and again, ναὸς ἅγιος τῷ κυρίῳ τῷ κατοικητήριον ἡμῶν τῆς καρδίας (ibid. c. 6); and Augustine, to quote one out of an infinite number of similar passages, writes, "Simulacrum Deo nefas est Christiano in templo collocare;" how much more to admit evil passions into the true temple of his heart! (de Fid. et Symbol. c. 7). Passages are, however, to be found in which "templum" and vaos are unmistakably used for a sacred Christian building. Ambrose, writing to Marcellina (Ep. 33), says that, on the new basilica being demanded of him for Arian worship, "respondi, templum Dei a sacerdote tradi non posse." Lac-tantius also (de Inst. lib. v. c. 2) states that at the time he was summoned to Bithynia to teach oratory "the temple of God was overthrown." The word ναός is also of frequent occurrence in the later books of Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History for the churches rebuilt after the persecution, e.g. ναὸς αὐτῆς ἐκ βάθρων εἰς ὕψος ἀπείρου ἐγχειρομένου (H. E. lib. x. c. 2), and says of that erected by Paulinus at Tyre, *ναὸς φιλοπόνο*ς ἐσκεύαστο (ibid. c. 4). Many other examples are referred to by Bingham (VIII. i. 6). [E. V.]

* Cumeanus Hyens., A.D. 630.

TENEBRAE. The office of Matins and Lauds in the last three days of Holy Week, at which a triangular candlestick with fifteen candles is used, one of which is extinguished after each psalm. The last one is, however, held behind the altar during the Benedictus, and is then brought back to typify Christ's resurrection from the dead. Allusions of Alcuin and Amalarius prove such an office, with local variations, to have existed in the 8th cent. (Martene, de Ant. Ec. Rit. iv. xxii. § 2). [F. E. W.]

TERCE. [HOURS OF PRAYER.]

TERENTIUS, April 10, African martyr under Decius (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.); Apr. 10, Oct. 28 (Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

TERMON, receiving etymologies more or less fanciful as terra immunis, terre-moine or terra monachorum, and the Sanscrit tarman, is probably the Irish form of the Latin terminus, and was originally the name given to a place of sanctuary, marked off by its stones set up as boundaries. Hence it was applied to all lands belonging to a sanctuary, and more generally to all church lands. As such the termons were entirely free from secular control or interference; they might be mensals to the bishop or monastery, or let to tenants for maintenance, service, or money rent, and he who had charge of the termon lands was called the erenach, whose importance is shewn by his name being often found in the Irish annals. The immunity of the termons from all lay exactions was affirmed by the council of Cashel (c. 4), A.D. 1172, as an old right that had been encroached upon by the lay lords. In the year 831 (Four Mast.), and again in 844, the Irish annals record the burning and pillaging of the termon or terra immunis of St. Ciaran at Clonmacnoise. The presence of a termon is frequently found in the nomenclature of Irish topography. (Ord. Surv., Londonderry, 50, 208 sq.; Ussher, wks. xi. 421 sq.; *Valancey, Coll. de Reb. TESIFON (CTESIPHON), May 15, bishop of Vergium in Spain (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom.). [C. H.]

TESSELLI. A word occurring in the life of Caesarius of Arles by Messianus and Stephen, published by Mabillon (Acta Sanctorum ordinis Benedicti, vol. i. 672), who explains (not. in loc.) the word as meaning "quadrati panniculi fovendo stomacho appositi." See also Ducange's Glossary, s. v. [R. S.]

TESSERAE. In the time of persecution, Christians recognised each other by secret signs or symbols, whether spoken as watchwords or pictorial. [GEMS; RINGS; SEALS.] Small tablets engraved with such symbols were called tesserae. Tesserae were given in particular to the newly baptized (tesserae baptismales), and the small fish of bronze or crystal which are frequently found, are believed to have served this purpose [Fish, p. 674]. It seems also probable that Christians, like their pagan forefathers, gave tesserae to each other as pledges of friendship (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Tessères). [C.]

TETRAPODIUM, a term in general use for any table with four feet; in special use for the table on which the bread and wine for oblation, the oil for consecration, &c., were placed in the Eastern Church. It usually stood near the iconostasis on the north side of the holy doors. [F. E. W.]

THEATRE. The objections of the teachers of the early church to the theatrical profession, and the reasons on which those objections were chiefly founded, have been partly stated under ACTORS; it will here consequently be necessary to consider simply what the church taught, and on what grounds, as regarded the lawfulness of witnessing such performances.

Here the maxim enunciated by the author of the treatise, de Spectaculis, that it was unlawful to witness what it was unlawful to do, "prohibit enim spectari quod prohibuit geri" (de Spect. c. 4; Migne, Patrol. iv. 340), would supply a ready solution of the question; nor is it necessary to inquire what was taught as to the desirability of being present at grossly immoral and indecent performances like those referred to by the early fathers (Minucius Felix, Octavius, pp. 343-4; Tatian, adv. Graecos, c. 22; Tertullian, de Spectaculis, cc. 10 and 17). The author of the above treatise de Spectaculis, formerly attributed to Cyprian, observes that "at the theatre it was lawful to teach whatever the law forbade" (Migne, 341), and declares that the Christian has better sights to witness, "the beauty of the world around, the rising and setting sun, the evolutions of the twinkling stars," &c. Augustine (de Civit. Dei, ii. 8), however, draws a distinction between the coarse representations of the mimes, and comedies or tragedies,—the latter class of plays being, he says, at least free from filthy language, while their study is approved by elders in a scheme of liberal education for youth; in his Confessions (iii. 2) he speaks of the performances he had himself witnessed as "luctuosa atque tragica," and of the scenes therein depicted as "vel antiquae vel falsae," language which clearly implies that the ancient drama still held its ground.

That the stage might be made a means of teaching moral lessons was a theory evidently not unknown to the primitive church, although the plea is summarily dismissed by Tertullian (de Spect. c. 27), who advises those whom he addresses to look upon whatever elements of good they may discern in stage productions as nothing better than "drops of honey intermingled with poison of toads" (Migne, i. 659). When, however, with the recognition of Christianity by the state, the majority of the population became professedly Christian, it was found altogether impossible to suppress such exhibitions. In conjunction with the games and combats of the circus they constituted very nearly the sum of the diversions of the lower orders (Ammian. Marcell. bk. xxviii. c. 4). Hence the utmost the church could do appears to have been to prohibit the profession of the actor among Christians, and to discourage as far as possible the popular passion for theatrical performances. The twenty-eighth of the African canons, recited at the council of Carthage in the year 419, forbids that "spectacula theatrorum" shall be given on Sundays or other days held sacred in the Christian calendar, for when such is the case, and especially at Easter, the canon goes on to say, "the people prefer the circus to the church," "populi ad circum magis quam ad ecclesiam conveniunt." The popularity which these performances still possessed for the majority is, however, clearly attested by the fact that the same canon enjoins that Christians shall not be compelled to witness them,—"nec oportere etiam quemquam Christianorum cogi ad haec spectacula" (Mansi, Conc. iv. 490). At the council of Arles, A.D. 452, Christians were forbidden to take part in the performance of plays, but nothing is said about their being present as spectators (Mansi, vii. 881; Hefele, Conciliengesch. ii. 283). Leo the Great says that in his day the theatre attracted greater throngs than even the celebrations at the festivals of the martyrs (Serm. 84; Migne, liv. 335).

In the East the untiring severity with which Chrysostom attacks these exhibitions [Opera (ed. Migne), ii. 337, 682; iv. 696-7; vi. 267; vii. 71, 426; viii. 120, 188, &c.], and the reproaches in which he indulges, clearly prove that even among the Christian community the fascinations of the theatre were too strong for their religious principles. At Antioch he complains that his audience brought with them to church the habits acquired in witnessing these performances, and instead of laying the exhortations of the preacher silently to heart, watched for opportunities of indulging in theatrical applause (Opera, ix. 227; Neander, der heil. Chrysost. i. 118). In his first homily on St. John he says that many Christians after listening to the words of Scripture and the Holy Spirit speaking therein, go away to witness lewd women "saying obscene things and representing still more obscene actions," and effeminate men indulging in buffoonery one with another (Migne, Patr. Graec. lix. 28-9).

Theatrical performances and the exhibitions of the circus appear to have been almost inseparably combined, and Isidorus, in the 7th century, indicates the characteristic vice of each kind of performance when he declares that Christians have no right to share in "the mad excitement of the circus, the impurity of the theatre, the cruelty of the amphitheatre, the barbarity of the arena, and the luxury of the play" (Etym. xix. 59; Migne, lxxii. 409). So again Salvian, when describing the recklessness of the population of Carthage during the invasion of the Vandals, says that "the church of Carthage indulged in the mad excitement of the circus and the softer delights of the theatre, and while the victims of the one were butchered without the city, the victims of the other were debauched within" (de Gub. Dei, vi. 12). It is probable, from other passages besides the foregoing, that the exhibition of gladiatorial conflicts was not infrequent, even after the time of Honorius (GLADIATORS). We find, for example, Theodoric the Great addressing to Maximus, the consul, a letter in which he makes reference to the different modes of conflict in certain games which Maximus has recently been instituting, especially the conflicts of men with wild beasts, and implies that the result is frequently fatal to the man. He regrets that Maximus should be under the necessity of holding these games ("quibus necesse est talia populis exhibere"), but urges him to greater liberality in rewarding the combatants (Cassiod. Variar. v. 42; Migne, lix. 675-7).

Among the collection of canons from former councils made at the second council of Braga, A.D. 610, we find one forbidding the clergy to be present at certain "spectacula," such as it was customary to give on the occasion of marriage feasts or other convivial entertainments; when any such exhibitions were about to commence the clergy were to withdraw (Migne, Patrol. lxxix. 624).

Where plays were not actually immoral in their tendency, the fathers of the church appear to have still held them to be open to objection. The author of the treatise attributed to Cyprian says that fathers of families were usually represented in a ridiculous light (de Spect. c. 6; Migne, iv. 341). Augustine associates such performances with paganism, and says that the gods enjoined them when the Pontifex Maximus would fain have forbidden them (de Civit. Dei, i. 32).

We find no traces of theatrical representations, properly so termed, among the Teutonic race for a long time after their conversion, not, in fact, until the institution of the religious plays of the middle ages. [J. B. M.]

THEBAEA LEGIO, Sept. 22 (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron., Notker., Wand.). [C. H.]

THECLA (TECLA, TEGLA) (1), Sept. 23, virgin, "Protomartyr" of Iconium, disciple of St. Paul, buried at Seleucia in Isauria (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Hieron., Vet. Rom., Rom., Notker., Wand.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vi. 546); Sept. 24 (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.); Mart. Hieron., followed by Notker., mentions her again under Feb. 22, in connexion with Nicomedia, and Bede's metrical martyrology assigns her, if the same, to Nov. 22. It must be this St. Thecla the martyr in whose memory Justinian built a church at Constantinople near the Julian gate (Procop. De Aedif. lib. i. cap. 4, ed. Dindorf, p. 190), and whose church or μαρτύριον is mentioned in the preface to the 159th Novel of Justinian (Ducange, Cpolis. Christ. lib. iv. pp. 104, 133, ed. 1729).

(2) June 1; commemorated with Zosimus at Antioch (Hieron., Notker.); Dec. 20 at Gildoba in Thrace (Hieron.).

(4) Aug. 19, martyr with Agapius at Gaza (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.).

(5) Oct. 8, virgin martyr with Barbara and Pelagia (Cal. Armen.); she may be the companion of Andropelagia at Alexandria on Sept. 6 (Menol., Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

THENES, COUNCIL OF (THENITANUM CONCILIIUM), A.D. 418(?). Three canons preserved by Ferrandus alone vouch for it. (Mansi, iv. 440.) [E. S. Ff.]

THEODORETUS, THEODORITUS. [THEODORUS (11).]

THEODORICUS, July 1, confessor at Reims (Mart. Usuard.). [C. H.]

THEODORUS (1), Dux, of Euchaïta, general of Licinius, martyr; commemorated on Jan. 12 (Cal. Byzant.); Feb. 8 (Cal. Byzant.; Basil. Menol.); Feb. 7 (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 23); June 8, translatio (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). It was probably this saint or the following to whom the church of St. Theodorus, erected by St. Helena at Constantinople, was dedicated (Codinus, De Aedif. p. 38; Ciam-pini, De Aedificiis, p. 176), as well as that erected by Justinian (Procop. De Aedif. lib. i. cap. 4; Ducange, Cpolis. Christ. lib. iv. p. 132). There was likewise at Constantinople in 536 a monastery of St. Theodorus (Mansi, viii. 907 B). On the distinction between this saint and the following Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 23 may be consulted.

(2) TIRO, of Amasia, soldier, megalomartyr at Heraclea, under Maximian; commemorated on Feb. 17 (Cal. Byzant.; Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.); Nov. 9 (Mart. Bed., Flor., Usuard., Adon., Rom.); under the same day Vet. Rom. Mart. and Wand. probably mean this saint. He is commemorated in the Gregorian Sacramentary on Nov. 9, his name appearing in the Collect, Super Oblata, and Ad Complendum.

(3) Patriarch of Alexandria, commemorated on Feb. 1, Mar. 9 (Cal. Ethiop.); Dec. 3 (Basil. Menol.); Sept. 12 (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iv. 10); under Sept. 2 the Mart. Hieron. probably means the same.

(4) Mar. 26, bishop of Pentapolis in Libya, martyr; commemorated with the deacon Hiereneus or Irenaeus and the readers Serapion and Ammonius (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 617).

(5) TRICHINAS, Apr. 20, solitary near Constantinople (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec. Boll. Acta SS. Apr. ii. 756).

(6) SICEOTES, Apr. 22, bishop, "our holy father" (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Menol. Graec.; Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 32).

(8) July 4, bishop of Cyrene in the reign of Diocletian, martyr (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Gr.; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. i. 19).

(9) Sept. 19, archbishop of Canterbury. It is inferred by the Bollandist Cleus (Acta SS. 19 Sept. vi. 55) that Bede, who records the day of his death, Sept. 19, must have taken it from the calendars of the church, thus affording proof of Theodore's early beatification. The inference is not confirmed by Bede's own martyrology, which omits him. Theodore does not occur in any of the early martyrologies, nor in the Martyrologium Romanum of 1498, Venice; but it appears in those of 1576, 1586, and all later dates.

(10) Martyr at Perga in the reign of Antoninus; commemorated Sept. 21 (Basil. Menol.); Apr. 19 (Menol. Graec.); Sept. 20 (Mart. Rom.).

(11) (THEODORETUS, THEODORITUS, THEODORICUS, THEODULUS), presbyter of Antioch, martyr under Julian; commemorated Oct. 23 (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Rom.); Mar. 23 (Flor., Hieron., Notker., Wand.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 449); Oct. 22 (Notker.); Nov. 24 (Menol. Graec.); Mar. 2 (*Basil. THEOTOKION (θεοτόκιον). A troparium or sticheron in honour of the Virgin Mary, of frequent occurrence in the sacred offices of the Greek Church, into which it is stated to have been introduced after the condemnation of the Nestorian heresy. Its occurrence is sometimes indicated by the marginal mark θ. [F. E. W.]

THERAPEUTAE. The ascetics mentioned under the name of θεραπευταί by Philo (de Vita Contempl. c. 4) were (it can scarcely be doubted) a development of the same tendency of Jewish thought which in Palestine produced the Essenes [DICT. OF THE BIBLE, i. 583]. There would be no need to notice them in a work on Christian Antiquities, were it not that Eusebius (H. E. ii. 17) takes them to have been a Christian sect which retained some Jewish customs. The supposition, however, that a Christian sect could have been formed in Egypt before the time when Philo wrote his treatise is destitute of all probability, and his language in no way favours the supposition. [C.]

THERISTRUM (θήριστρον). A dress or veil for female use, specially adapted, as the name shews, for summer wear. The Greek word occurs several times in the LXX (Gen. xxiv. 65, xxxviii. 14, 19; Cant. v. 8; Isa. iii. 23), in all cases for one of the two Hebrew words תְּרִיסָרָה. In Gen. xxxviii. 14, Isa. iii. 23, the Vulgate reproduces the Greek word. See Jerome (Comm. in Isa. l. c.), whose remarks are also cited by Isidore (Etym. xix. 25. 6; Patrol. lxxxiii. 692). [R. S.]

THESSALONICA, COUNCILS OF (THESSALONICENSIA CONCILIA), A.D. 649-50. Two seem to have been held in consecutive years by Paul, its Monothelite bishop—one for confirming his heretical doctrines which he then embodied in a letter to be sent to pope Martin, the other for dealing with the reply made to him by that pope. (Mansi, x. 785; L'Art de vérif. les Dates, i. 155.) [E. S. Ff.]

THEUSETA, Mar. 13, martyr at Nicaea, commemorated with Horris and others (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Notker., Hieron., Rom.). [C. H.]

THEVESTINE, COUNCIL OF (THEVESTINUM CONCILIUM), A.D. 362, held by the Donatists, whom the emperor Julian had given leave to return, at which Pimosus, bishop of that place, protested in vain against their excesses. (Mansi, iii. 374.) [E. S. Ff.]

THEVIS, COUNCIL OF (THEVINENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 536, when ten bishops under Nierses, catholicos of the Armenians, rejected the council of Chalcedon, and declared for the Monophysite doctrine, thereby separating themselves from the church (Mansi, viii. 871). Mansi (ix. 771) reports a second council, which, however, he miscalls, at this place, where the addition to the Trisagion—Qui crucifixus es pro nobis—was confirmed, A.D. 562. The authors of L'Art de vérif. les Dates report a council at another place in Armenia, called Tiben, ten years before, confirming all that had been done by Nierses and the ten bishops of the first council. (i. 152.) [E. S. Ff.]

THOMAS, ST., APOSTLE, LEGEND AND FESTIVALS OF. 1. Legend, &c.—As the name Thomas is merely the Aramaean word for a twin, with a Grecized termination, it is obvious that the apostle must also have had a personal name. This is given as Judas, e.g. by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. i. 13), the Acts of Thomas, the Doctrine of the Apostles (in Cureton's Ancient Syriac Documents), &c. Supposing this to be correct, it would be very natural that with two other Apostles of the name Judas, advantage should thus be taken of a convenient means of distinction.

Who the other twin was it is of course impossible to guess. From the fact that St. Thomas is always coupled with St. Matthew in the lists of the Apostles in the Synoptic Gospels, it has been argued that St. Matthew was the other brother. Again, two Paris MSS. cited by Cotelier (Apost. Const. lib. ii. 63, note) speak of St. Thomas and his sister Lysia, and add that Antioch was the native place of the Apostle. It has been argued by Thilo (Acta S. Thomae, p. 95) that the author of the apocryphal Acts identified Thomas with Judas the brother of the Lord. Here we might cite the curious remark of Isidore, that Thomas was "juxta Latinam linguam Christi geminus ac similis Salvatori" (de Ortu et Obitu Patrum, c. 74; Patrol. lxxiii. 152).

Save the mention of Thomas in the lists of the Apostles, the only allusions to him in the New Testament are to be found in John xi. 16; xiv. 5; xx. 25 sqq.

The general tenour of early tradition connects him with Edessa and with Parthia (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. i. 13; iii. 1 [cited from Origen]; Socrates, Hist. Eccles. i. 19). Chrysostom (Hom. in Heb. 26, § 2; vol. xii. 338, ed. Gaume) speaks of the graves of Peter, Paul, John, and Thomas, as being those whose locality was known, though he does not specify them. That, according to the current tradition, St. Thomas was interred at Edessa may be inferred from Socrates (Hist. Eccles. iv. 18, cf. Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. vi. 18), who speaks of the splendid memorial church there (καθόριον). Some authorities also give India as the scene of the Apostle's labours (Greg. Naz. Orat. xxxiii. 11; Patrol. Gr. xxxvi. 27). Sophronius, in an Appendix to the De Viris Illustribus of Jerome (vol. ii. 958), says that St. Thomas preached the Gospel to the "Parthians, Medes, Persians, Carmanians, Hyrcanians, Bactrians, and Magians," and that he died at Calamina in India. The story of the Apostle's work in India also forms the basis of the Acts of Thomas, already referred to.

It is by no means clear how we are to interpret the name India. The word is doubtless often used in a somewhat vague way, and there are grounds for believing the India of the Acts of Thomas to be Arachosia and the neighbouring regions, lying westward of the Indus (see Dict. of Christian Biography, Vol. I. p. 23). On the other hand, we find traditions associating the name of St. Thomas with the extreme south of India. When the Portuguese expeditions under Vasco de Gama and Pedro de Cabral succeeded in reaching India, they found there (first apparently in A.D. 1500) Christians, belonging to a fully developed and obviously very ancient church.

These Christians claimed the apostle St. Thomas as their founder, and, still surviving as a distinct church, are ordinarily known as "Christians of St. Thomas." The district occupied by these people was part of Malabar, on the western side of the southern extremity of India, between the ninth and twelfth parallels of north latitude. With their history generally we have nothing to do here, but a brief notice may be bestowed on the legend connecting them with the apostle. [On the subject generally, see Assemani, Bibl. Or. vol. iii. part 2, pp. 435 sqq.; La Croze, Histoire du Christianisme des Indes; Howard, The Christians of St. Thomas, and their Liturgies.] It would of course be rash to claim the legend as authentic history; it is, perhaps, none the less rash to maintain its certain groundlessness, but this latter form of rashness, it would appear, has seemed more justifiable than the former. We pass over as inconclusive from the vagueness of the word India, the story of Pantaenus's journey thither (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. v. 10); and the alleged presence of a "Metropolitan of Persia and the great India," among the signatories of the Council of Nicaea.*

We come to something undoubted, however, in the narrative of Cosmas Indicopleustes, who visited India in the 6th century, and tells us, "In the island of Ceylon (Ταπροβανή) in further (ἐξωτέρᾳ) India, where the Indian Ocean is, there is a church of Christians, with both clergymen and believers. In Malabar (Μαλέ), in like manner, where the pepper grows . . . and in the place called Calliana, there is also a bishop, ordained and sent from Persia" (Topographia Christiana, lib. iii.; Patrol. Gr. lxxviii. 169; cf. lib. xi. ib. 446). In the 9th century Sighelm and Aethelstan were sent by king Alfred with alms to Rome, and thence to India, "to St. Thomas and St. Bartholomew" (Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, sub anno A.D. 883, p. 152, ed. Thorpe; William of Malmesbury, lib. ii. 122). The latter chronicler speaks of the envoy as Sigelin, bishop of Sherborne. Again, in the 13th century, Marco Polo visited the place in Southern India, where St. Thomas was said to have been martyred (lib. iii. cc. 17, 18); and see Col. Yule's notes, vol. ii. 342, ed. 2).

The existence, then, of these "Christians of St. Thomas," can be traced back definitely to the 6th century, and we have references of a still earlier date, which, however, do not necessarily apply. Those who reject the tradition of the apostle's labours in India ascribe the foundation of the Malabar church to one Thomas Cana, who, in any case, bore an important part in the history of this distant branch of the church. His date and nationality, however, are much disputed, for while one account makes him an Armenian, and places him at any rate before the sixth century (La Croze, p. 46), others (e.g. Assemani, op. cit. p. 444) think Armenian an error for Aramaean, and fix the date at the end of the 8th century, when he was sent out by the Nestorian patriarch. If this latter date could be considered as proved, then whatever share this later Thomas may have had in the development of the Malabar church, he clearly could not have been the founder,^b since the testimony of Cosmas shews that Christianity was existing in Malabar more than two centuries before his time. In this uncertainty we must leave the matter, merely observing that if it be proved that the word India in the apocryphal Acts is used in a different sense from that in which we now use the word, still this only touches the main question to the same extent as if the Acts had called the region, e.g. Parthia, in which case we should have had two distinct claimants, not necessarily altogether antagonistic.

We conclude this part of our subject by remarking that the common form of the story as to the apostle's remains describes them as translated from India to Edessa, where they were buried (Mart. Rom., Usuard, Bede). The first named Martyrology speaks also of a later translation thence to Orthona in Apulia.

It may further be noted that whereas writers who refer to the manner of St. Thomas's death at all, invariably speak of it as a violent one, Clement of Alexandria cites Heracleon, the Gnostic to the effect that Thomas was one of those who died a natural death (Strom. iv. 9).

2. Festivals.—It seems probable that the observance of a festival of St. Thomas first arose in the East and thence passed to the West. Perhaps the earliest testimony to which we can refer is a Homily, cited as Chrysostom's by two early councils, but which editors have long decided not to be his, from the marked inferiority of style (vol. viii. 624, in Spuriis). Still Tillemont's arguments, to which Montfaucon assents as at any rate probable, tend to shew that it would have been delivered at Edessa in A.D. 402. The Homily is evidently delivered before the tomb of the Apostle (γέροντες καὶ νέοι προσπίπτονέν σου τῷ ταφῇ), and is distinct evidence of the existence of a festival (cf. also Socrates, l.c.; Sozomen, l.c.). The two historians speak of the splendid church of St. Thomas at Edessa and of the emperor Valens's visit to it. The author of the life of St. Ephrem (ob. circ. A.D. 373) tells a story of the healing of a paralytic before the doors of this church (Assemani, Bibl. Or. i. 49). About twenty years after St. Ephrem's death (year of Greeks 705 = A.D. 394), there took place, according to the Edessene Chronicle, the translation of the coffin of St. Thomas to the church dedicated to him in Edessa. The day is specified as August 22 (op. cit. p. 399; cf. also p. 403, where the prefect Anatolius is said to have made a silver coffin for the apostle's remains). The celebration of the festival in Edessa is dwelt on by Gregory of Tours (de Gloria Martyrum, i. 31; Patrol. lxxi. 733). By him it is said to happen "mense quinto." If this is taken according to Western reckoning, the 5th month would be July, and, as we shall see, on July 3 is a commemoration of the translation in the Western church. Ruinart, however (not. in loc.), appears to refer the 5th to the Syriac reckoning, so that counting from November, the 5th month would be March. We shall presently mention a commemoration of the Apostle in this month in the East.

The earliest definite reference to a festival other than the local Edessene one, carries us back to the middle of the 5th century. Theodoret (Graec. Aff. Cur., Serm. 8; Patrol. Gr. lxxxiii. 1033) speaks of the change of the old festivals of the heathen gods, into those of Peter and Paul and Thomas (the only three apostles mentioned), and other saints.

As regards the West, the earliest reference to the cultus of St. Thomas in any way is, so far as we are aware, to be found in a sermon of Gaudentius (bishop of Brescia at the beginning of the 5th century), on the occasion of the dedication of a church (basilica concilii Sanctorum). The good bishop claims to have acquired for this church relics of St. Thomas and three other saints (Serm. 17; Patrol. xx. 959).

It may fairly be assumed that the festival of St. Thomas was but gradually, and not till a comparatively late date, recognized in the churches of the West. This may be inferred from the absence of any mention of it in e.g. the ancient Kalendarium Carthaginense, the Roman Calendar of Fronto, the Leonine Sacramentary, and some forms of the Gregorian Sacramentary (e.g. Cdd. Reg. Suec., Calensis), Mabillon's Lectionarium Luxoviense, the Gothico-Gallic Missal, the Orationale Gothicum, &c., representing North Africa, Rome, Gaul, and Spain.

It is found, on the other hand, in the Gelasian and in some forms of the Gregorian Sacramentaries, the Mozarabic Missal and Breviary, the Martyrologium Hieronymi, &c. In these St. Thomas is commemorated on December 21, the commemoration being undoubtedly of the martyrdom, though, as we shall see, in some cases it has been referred to the supposed translation of the Apostle's remains from India to Edessa.

In the last named of the above cited authorities, besides the main Western festival on December 21, several other commemorations are given. As regards this chief festival, it may be noted that while the reference to it in the list of festivals of Apostles, which forms a prologue to the Martyrology, speaks of it as "natalis Thomae Apostoli qui passus est in India" (Patrol. xxx. 451), the notice in the ordinary course of the Calendar gives "in Mesopotamia, natalis et translatio sancti Thomae Apostoli qui translatus est ab Indis, cujus passio ibidem celebratur" (ib. 501). We further have on December 28, "in Edessa, translatio corporis S. Thomae Apostoli;" on February 9, "depositio Thomae," if this be the Apostle (ib. 457); on May 9, a commemoration of SS. John, Andrew, and Thomas, at Milan, in the "basilica ad portam Romanam" (ib. 471); on June 3, a festival of the "natalis" (ib. 476); and on July 3, "in Edessa . . . natalis et translatio corporis S. Thomae Apostoli . . ." (ib. 479).

In the other documents cited, December 21 is the Natalis in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacra-

^b No weight at all need be given to the claim on behalf of the Thomas, mentioned by Theodoret (Haeret. Fab. Comp. i. 26; Patrol. Gr. lxxxii. 380), as one of the three missionary disciples sent out by Manes, India being assigned as his province. It is a sufficient answer to say that no trace of Manichaeism was seen, when the Malabar Christians became known to the outer world.

^c Menard gives the mass for the day, but Pamelius puts it in brackets (Liturgg. Lat. ii. 364).

mentaries, the martyrology of Bede, &c. So, for instance, we have in the metrical martyrology of Bede (Patrol. xciv. 606),

"Bis senis caelum coepit conscendere Thomas."

The metrical martyrology of Wandalbert, however (Patrol. cxxi. 622), refers the day to the translation,

"Translati Thomae celebret duodenus honorem," and the martyrology of Usuard has in one MS. (Cod. Lucensis) the translation, and in another (Cod. Corbeiensis), the two commemorations combined. The true text, however, of this last martyrology certainly gives Natalis. The day really associated with the translation in the Western church is July 3 (so Mart. Rom., Bede, Usuard, Mart. Hier.), and occasionally the two commemorations have flowed together.

In the Greek church, the day on which St. Thomas is commemorated is October 6. Thus e. g. in the metrical Ephemerides prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May, the notice for the day is δούρασιιν οὐτάσθη Θωμάς μακροῖσιν ἐν ἑκτῇ (Acta Sanctorum; May, vol. i. p. xlvii.). It may be noted further that the first Sunday after Easter is, in the Greek church, known as the Sunday of St. Thomas, from the subject of the gospel. This, however, is not strictly to be called a commemoration. In the Pentecostarion the title of the day is given in full, as κυριακή τοῦ ἀντίπασχα ἡτοι ἡ ψηλάφσις τοῦ ἁγίου ἀποστόλου Θωμά, writ short in the Synaxarion as κυριακή τοῦ Θωμά. The same gospel is used both on this day and on October 6, St. John xx. 19-31.

In the calendars of the Armenian church given by Assemani (Bibl. Or. vol. iii. part 1, pp. 645 sqq.), March 31 is given in both as a commemoration of the "unbelief of Thomas;" August 22 commemorates "Thomas the Apostle," with a reference to India in the case of one of them; and on October 6 is yet another commemoration, but in one calendar only.

In the calendars of the Alexandrian and Ethiopic churches, given by Ludolf, is a commemoration of St. Thomas by the former church on September 9 (ad Hist. Aeth. Comm. p. 391), by the latter church on October 6, with the note "apostle of India" (ib. p. 394), and by both churches on May 21 (ib. p. 417).

3. Apocryphal Literature.—An apocryphal gospel, bearing the name of St. Thomas, was current in early times. There are two distinct recensions of it in Greek, and an independent Latin form, the Latin and one of the Greek texts having first been published by Tischendorf. The gospel is apparently referred to by Irenaeus (adv. Haer. i. 20); and the author of the Philosophumena mentions it by name (lib. v. Patrol. Gr. xvi. 3134), and probably also Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 25). Cyril of Jerusalem, in speaking of it, assigns it to Thomas, the missionary-disciple of Manes, to whom we have already referred (Catech. iv. 36; Patrol. Gr. xxxiii. 593; cf. Catech. vi. 31). In view of the above-mentioned references this of course is absurd. For further details see GOSPELS, APOCRYPHAL, in Dict. of Christian Biography. We have also Acts of Thomas, first edited by Thilo, and since by Tischendorf. This and the Consummation of Thomas, first edited by Tischendorf, form the beginning and end of a whole, of which some of the middle part is lost. An abridged form is given in the Apostolic History of the Pseudo-Abdias (lib. ix.; in Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigr. N. T. vol. i. pp. 687 sqq.), and we have also the Syriac form of the Acts edited by Dr. Wright. The Acts of Thomas are mentioned by Epiphanius (Haer. 47; Patrol. Gr. xli. 852), and a περίοδος Θωμά is named in the Stichometria of Nicephorus (Patrol. Gr. c. 1060), which is possibly, though not certainly, the same as the preceding. Both Gospel and Acts of Thomas were condemned by the council that sat at Rome under Gelasius in A.D. 494 (Patrol. lix. 162). A Revelation of Thomas, no longer extant, was condemned at the same time. In the Apostolic Constitutions (lib. viii. 21) the constitution with respect to sub-deacons is referred to St. Thomas.

For further notices on the subject of St. Thomas reference may be made to Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, vol. v. part i. p. 523 sqq.; Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, vol. iii. pp. 219 sqq. The Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists do not avail us here, not having advanced as yet farther than the end of October.

An oratory dedicated to him was built and adorned by pope Symmachus in the Vatican Basilica (Anastas. Lib. Pontif. art. "Symmachus"; Ciampini, de Aedif. pp. 69, 95). In the *Cal. THREE CHILDREN, SONG OF THE. [BENEDICTE, p. 186.]

THREE KINGS. [EPIPHANY; MAGI.]

THRONE (Lat. thronus; Gr. θρόνος), a seat to be occupied by persons of pre-eminent dignity on solemn occasions. By early writers (v. CATHEDRA) the words "throne" and cathedra seem to have been not unfrequently employed indiscriminately for the seat of the bishop, and "throne" was even employed for the benches on which the presbyters sat. At the present day we use the former word when we speak of the bishop's seat in his cathedral church.

A distinction, however, has existed both in the use of the words and in the objects themselves; "cathedra" being the more proper expression for the chair of a bishop, throne for that of an archbishop, a patriarch, a pope, or a sovereign prince. A good though late example of this distinction is afforded by the words used in the consecration of the pope of Rome when already a bishop, before he is placed in the papal seat by the senior cardinal bishop: "Deus . . . respice quæsumus propicius hunc famulum tuum N. quem de humili cathedra violententer sublimatum in thronum ejusdem apostolorum principis (i. e. St. Peter) sublimamus" (Marcelus, Rituum Eccles. &c. libri tres, p. xv. Ven. 1516).

That there was a distinction between the material throne and the cathedra we may learn by comparing the representations of the former to be found in mosaics in Rome and Ravenna, and in sculpture in marble and ivory, with existing examples of cathedrae; of these last several are to be found in the basilicas at Rome, often ancient "sellæ balneares," of marble, of moderate size, with arms, rounded behind, and with a low, upright, back finishing, with a curved outline. Such are the cathedrae in the churches of S. Stefano Rotondo and SS. Nereo ed Achilleo at Rome. The chairs in the catacombs hewn in the living rock, and that in which the figure believed to represent Hippolytus, bishop of Porto, is placed (now in the museum of the Lateran), are all varieties of this form. The ivory cathedra at Ravenna, believed to date from the time of Justinian, is of nearly the same type, but has a much higher back. The cathedra in St. Cecilia at Rome is formed of marble slabs, but is of the same type.

If, however, we examine the mosaics above-mentioned, we find that objects symbolical of our Lord, as crosses, or figures representing Him or the Virgin Mary, are placed on seats of a different type—that of a wide seat without arms, and usually with a low, straight back. This type, it would seem, was derived from the Roman bisellium, a seat of honourable distinction, which was a sort of wide stool without arms or back.

The emperor Theodosius and his sons Arcadius and Honorius are represented as seated on such seats on the silver disk at Madrid. In the mosaic, probably dating from the 4th century, in the apse of Sta. Pudenziana at Rome, the throne on which our Lord sits appears to have a low, straight back; and in the mosaic on the triumphal arch of Sta. Maria Maggiore, in the same city, the infant Saviour is placed on a wide seat with low sides and back. This mosaic probably dates from the 5th century. In the church of SS. Cosmo and Damian—a mosaic which covers the surface of the wall in front of the apse—has on the summit of the arch a figure of the holy lamb placed on a throne, represented as a wide stool richly ornamented and furnished with a cushion, but without sides or back. This mosaic dates from the 6th century.

"The distinction between the two forms was, it would appear, not rigidly kept up, thrones being sometimes furnished like cathedrae, with arms and backs; but it will generally be found that down to the mediaeval period bishops are usually represented in works of art as seated in chairs with arms and backs, while sovereign princes often appear as occupying seats without sides, though furnished with backs. Good examples will be found in plates lxvi. lxvii. of Agincourt's History of Art by its Monuments, section "Painting," particularly figs. 2-7 on the former, and 4 on the latter page. In the first the countess Matilda and her ancestors are shewn; in the last, the emperor Constantine. All these are taken from MSS. of the 12th century.

It seems probable that thrones were constructed without arms, in order that as they were intended for the use of persons of the highest dignity, on occasions of great solemnity, when dresses of the utmost richness would be worn, the stiff or voluminous embroidered robes of the dignitaries who occupied them might be conveniently disposed and fully seen, possibly also the tradition of the form of the Roman bisellium may have had its influence.

No example of a true throne, constructed within the period embraced by this work, has been described, but one probably very little later in date has been preserved—the so-called cathedra Petri—which is kept in a repository in the wall of the apse of the Vatican Basilica at Rome. This chair, after having remained shut up for many years, was exhibited in 1866 on the occasion of the centenary celebration of the martyrdom of St. Peter, and was carefully examined, among others, by that distinguished antiquary and student of Christian art, Padre Raffaele Garrucci. The legend that it had been the curule chair of the senator Pudens, and bestowed by him upon St. Peter, is evidently erroneous, for the chair bears no resemblance whatever to a curule chair, which was fashioned in such a manner as to fold up like many garden chairs (v. a paper on the "Fauteuil de Dagobert," by M. Lenormant, in the first volume of the Mélanges d'Archéologie). It is a chair without arms, but with a back finishing in a pediment. On the front, below the seat, are fixed some carvings in ivory, but these are additions, not part of the original decorations. What, doubtless, are original, are the bands of carved ivory which are placed perpendicularly and horizontally on the front and back, and on each side of the pediment. On these are sculptured various groups of warriors fighting with men and with beasts, monstrous animal figures, and the like; but the most remarkable subject is a half-length figure of an emperor which Padre Garrucci believes to represent Charles the Bald. No figure or symbol of a religious character is to be found in these carvings; and from these facts it has been inferred that it was probably a throne made for or presented to Charles the Bald at the time of his coronation at Rome, A.D. 875. It may be, at any rate, safely asserted that neither its construction nor its ornamentation indicates that it was constructed for a cathedra (v. Two Memoirs on St. Peter's Chair, published by the Society of Antiquaries, 1870).

Thrones are to be found on works of art so represented as to shew that they combine the elements of the curule or folding chair and of the throne; and one remarkable example exists in the "Fauteuil de Dagobert," preserved in the Louvre (v. woodcut). In this instance it will be seen, that, in addition to the folding-pieces in the form of an X, there are uprights finishing in lions' heads. On many consular diptychs the throne on which the consul sits is so represented as to shew that it was constructed in like manner. M. Lenormant considers that the chair in question is probably of the period of the sovereign whose name it bears (A.D. 622-638). The curule chair, in its simple and primitive form, was evidently the model of the faldistorium or faldstool, the portable seat occupied by a bishop or abbat. M. Lenormant supposes that the use of such a chair was allowed to bishops in recognition of the dignity of their office.

In a painting in the cemetery of St. Callixtus at Rome (v. Marriott's Vestiarium Christianum, pl. xv.), St. Peter and St. Paul are represented as occupying such seats, while our Lord is seated on an elevated throne without sides, but with a high back. As none of the figures have nimbi surrounding their heads, and the style of drawing is good, this painting should belong to an early period. [A. N.]

THURIBLE, a censer, a vessel for burning incense, called also thymiaterium, thuricremium, incensorium, fumigatorium. The thurible was usually made of precious metals, and was at first no more than an open dish or vase, to which a pierced cover was subsequently added, and eventually chains for swinging; these last, however, are not found earlier than the 12th century. An example of this date, suspended by three chains, is given by Martigny from the church of the Nativity at Bethlehem, De Vogue, Eglises de la Terre Sainte, pl. iii. Ciampini, tom. iii. tab. xxxiii. There is no mention of them in the Apostolical Constitutions. Thuribles of gold or silver, of large size and ornamented with precious stones, occur very frequently in Anastasius among the gifts made by the popes to the Vatican and other Roman basilicas. To take one example. Constantine is recorded to have presented to the Lateran two thuribles of gold set with jewels, one weighing 30 lbs., the other 15 lbs. (Anastas. in Sylvestro). Evagrius (H. E. vi. 21) also mentions golden thuribles among the gifts of Chosroes to the Church of Constantinople. The weight of these vessels shews that they were stationary, not to be swung.

"Hic quoque Thuribulum capitellis undique cinctum, Pendet de summo, fumosa foramina pandens,
De quibus ambrosia spirant tura Sabaea.
Quando sacerdotes missas offerre jubentur."

According to Amalarius (lib. iii. c. 18), "Thuribulum ante Evangelium portatur, quia Christus odor suavitatis in igne passionis pro nobis sacrificatus praedicatur." We find a different symbolism in the Gemma Animae (lib. i. c. 42), "Thuribulum significat corpus Dominicum; incensum ejus Divinitatem; ignis Spiritum Sanctum."

THURIFICATI. Those who in times of persecution betrayed the faith by offering incense to idols. Frankincense was an accompaniment of the heathen sacrifices, so that the offering of it was made a common test in the persecutions. The act of burning incense was so slight, taking two or three grains in the fingers and sprinkling them on the fire, that it readily lent itself to the purposes of a test, and the Christians were urged to save themselves by complying with it. "It seems absurd to be tortured and slain rather than throw into the fire incense taken with two little fingers" (Tertull. de Idol. c. 11, note, Oxford ed.). For the penalties incurred by compliance see SACRIFICATI. [G. M.]

TINTINNUM, a bell (v. BELL). The verses by Tatwine, archbishop of Canterbury (A.D. 731-734), alluded to in the article BELL, run as follows:—

DE TINTINNO.

Olim dictabar proprio cognomine Caesar
Optabantque meum proceres jam cernere vultum
Nunc aliter versor superis suspensus in auris
Et caesus cogor late persolvere plantum
Cursibus haut tardis cum adhuc tum turba recurrit
Mordeo mordentem labris mox dentibus absque.

From these verses it would seem that in the earlier part of the 8th century it had become customary in England, as on the Continent at a still earlier date, to hang bells of considerable size on the exterior of churches in order that the congregation might be summoned by their sound. Alcuin (ob. 804), describing the works executed at York, says (Opera, ed. Fröben, ep. 171), "Videtur condignum ut domuscula eloccarum stagno tegatur propter ornamentum et loci celebritatem." The "domuscula" in this instance would seem not to have been a tower, but rather a small separate edifice. Bells, according to Walafrid Strabo, who wrote in the early part of the 9th century (de Exord. et Increment. rer. Eccl. c. 5), were of two kinds, "fusilia," and "productilia," the former cast, the latter of sheets of metal, joined by rivets and hammered into form, in the manner of the early Irish hand-bells. The "tintinnum" of which archbishop Tatwine wrote was of the former class, and it should seem formed out of a bronze statue of some Roman emperor. Few, if any, bells of this early period (if we except the small Irish hand-bells) are probably now in existence, but Filippini is quoted as stating in his history of Corsica that a bell, bearing the date A.D. 700, had been found in the old campanile of the church of S. Maria dell' Assunzione near St. Florent in that island; it does not appear what was the size of this bell. [A. N.]

TIRIDATES, king, commemorated June 29 (Cal. Armen.). [C. H.]

TITHES (δέκαται, decimae). There is hardly any evidence of the general payment of tithes before the end of the 4th century. Until the publication of Selden's History of Tithes, A.D. 1618, the generally prevailing opinion was that tithes were due de jure divino, and that if not paid from the beginning, they were paid as soon as the church was free from persecution. This opinion not only lacks the direct support of antiquity, but is opposed to the few notices we have remaining of the practice of the early church. As the same passages have been quoted on both sides of the controversy, and as much depends upon the actual expressions, the more important evidence must be quoted in full.

In the 1st century it is admitted by all that there is no evidence of the payment of tithes. When the collection was made for the poor brethren in Jerusalem at Antioch, each man gave "according to his ability" (Acts xi. 29); in the churches of Galatia and of Corinth, each is ordered to give "as God has prospered him." (1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2.) In the epistles to Timothy, where St. Paul touches upon the finances of the church, there is no mention of tithes or of any other fixed proportion as being paid or considered due.

In the 2nd century also it was felt that to fix upon a definite proportion was to limit the free spirit of Christian love. Irenaeus (Hæc. iv. 27) says that our Lord came to expand and extend the law, and in place of definite commands to substitute principles; "and therefore instead of 'thou shalt not commit adultery,' he commanded men not to lust (Matt. v. 28), and instead of 'thou shalt not kill,' not even to be angry; and instead of paying tithes to divide all one's goods to the poor." Thus did Christ remove "the fetters of slavery." So again (iv. 34) Irenaeus contrasts the servitude of the law of Moses with the freedom of the sonship of Christians: "and for this reason, whilst they (the Jews) used to consider the tithes of their property as consecrated, they, on the contrary, who have apprehended freedom, decree to the uses of the Lord all things which they have—joyfully and freely giving not what is less, inasmuch as they have a greater hope." Yet in iv. 20, after stating that the Levites lived on tithes, he adds "Discipulis inquit Dominus Leviticam substantiam habentibus."

In the 3rd century, Origen (Hom. xi. in Numeros), advocating the payment of first-fruits mentions tithes also, not as due from Christians, but as a limitation which the Christian will exceed. He quotes Matt. xxiii. 23, "'Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithes of mint, and anise, and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.' But if you say that He was saying this with reference to the Pharisees, not to the disciples, hear Him again saying to the disciples, 'Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven.' What then He wishes to be done by the Pharisees, he wishes to be fulfilled much more and with greater abundance by the disciples. What He does not wish to be done by the disciples He does not command the Pharisees either to do. How then is our righteousness abounding more than that of the scribes and Pharisees, if they dare not taste the fruits of their land before they offer first-fruits to the priests, and tithes be separated for the Levites; whilst I, doing none of these things, so misuse the fruits of the earth that the priest knows nothing of them, the Levite is ignorant of them, the divine altar does not perceive them?" (cf. Hom. xvi. in Genesisim.)

That Origen did not intend in this passage to give his judgment upon tithes is evident from the incidental way in which they are referred to, and from his formal conclusion in which he makes no mention of them, "Haec diximus efferentes mandatum de primitiis frugum vel pecorum debere etiam secundum literam stare."

Cyprian (Epist. i. 9, ed. Erasmus, 66 Pamel.) writes to dissuade a presbyter from accepting the position of guardian on the ground that the clergy are separated from all secular business. The tribe of Levi had no inheritance but was supported by tithes, that they might devote themselves entirely to divine service; "the same plan and form is now preserved in regard to the clergy," that they may not be diverted from their sacred duties, but receiving, as it were tithes ("sed in honore sportulantium fratrum tanquam decimas accipientes") may not depart from the altar. Here the phrase tanquam decimas is decisive against the payment of tithes as a fixed legal due, for decimae paid as legal dues could not be tanquam decimae. There is analogy, not identity in the method of support.

Cyprian also laments the diminution of almsgiving, which was consequent upon dissension (de Unitate, 23). "Then they were selling houses and estates, but now from our patrimony we give not even tithes; and when the Lord bids us sell, we are rather buying and increasing."

This passage is against the fact of payment, and does not even recommend tithes; for the reference is not to annual income, but to property: "we give not even the tenth part of our estates," not, "we do not even pay tithes on our estates."

Thus the fathers of the first three centuries nowhere speak of tithes as even a minimum due de jure divino, though they had occasion for saying so, had such been the opinion of the church, or had tithes generally been paid as legally due; they frequently and earnestly exhorted to almsgiving, they never exhort their hearers to give tithes.

These are all the genuine passages which can be brought forward. They fail completely to shew that tithes were paid as a fact, or that payment was considered necessary de jure divino. In early times a tenth was not an authorised or an adequate proportion. Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Cyprian, all make some reference to church finance, but in none of them are tithes mentioned as a source of income.

During the 4th century the Apostolic Constitutions refer to tithes. In lib. ii. cap. xxv. we read, "The gifts of tithes and first-fruits which are given in accordance with the command of God, let the bishop, as a man of God, expend." The Levites were so supported of old, and the clergy are the Levites now. Yet after this, a clear distinction is drawn between tithes payable then under the law, and the oblations offered now, under the Gospel. See also lib. vii. cap.

St. Ambrose (Sermo xxxiv. in feria 3 post prim. dom. quadr.) says, "God has reserved the tenth part to Himself, and therefore it is not lawful for a man to retain what God has reserved for Himself. To thee He has given nine parts, for Himself He has reserved the tenth part, and if thou shalt not give to God the tenth part, God will take from thee the nine parts."

So in a sermon on Ascension Day, "a good Christian pays tithes yearly to be given to the poor." (Cf. in Lucan xi. 7.)

Epiphanius (Haer. 50) argues against those who kept Easter according to the Jewish law for fear of the curse of the law, though in other respects they agreed with the church. The curse, he says, refers not to the case of the passover only, but also to circumcision and tithes. Thus he implies that the law of tithe was not binding on the church any more than the law of circumcision, and also that it was not observed by those whom he was addressing any more than by the church at large.

In the 5th century, Jerome on Malachi iii. says, "What we have said of tithes and first-fruits, which of old used to be given by the people to the priests and Levites, understand also in the case of the peoples of the church, to whom it has been commanded to sell all they have and give to the poor and follow the Lord the Saviour. . . . If we are unwilling to do this, at least let us imitate the rudimentary teaching of the Jews so as to give a part of the whole to the poor, and pay the priests and Levites due honour. If anyone shall not do this he is convicted of defrauding and cheating God."

In an epistle to Nepotianus, Jerome writes, "If I am the portion of the Lord, and the line of his inheritance, and do not receive a portion among the other tribes, but as if (quasi) a Levite and priest live upon tithes, and serving the altar am supported by the oblation of the altar." His language is clearly metaphorical, and not a precise statement of a fact.

Augustine (Ps. 146) gives conclusive evidence that tithes were not yet regarded as a legal due "Cut off, therefore, something first, and assign some fixed portion. . . . take off some considerable part of your income? Tithes will you? Take off tithes, although it be too little ("decimas vis? decimas exime"). . . . He beyond whom your righteousness is to abound, gives tithes; you, however, give not even a thousandth part.

In Homily 48, Augustine says that the present excessive taxation is laid upon them because they do not give to God the things that are God's. "Our ancestors used to abound in wealth of every kind for this very reason that they used to give tithes, and pay the tax to Caesar. Now, on the contrary, because devotion to God has ceased, the drain of the treasury has increased. We have been unwilling to share the tithes with God, now the whole is taken away. Alms ought to be paid according to the measure and quantity as it is written (Tobit iv.) 'As thou shalt have, give alms; if thou shalt have little, from that little impart to the hungry.'"

In his sermon to the brethren in the wilderness (Serm. 64), he warns those who till the earth not to defraud the church in the matter of tithes, nor any other, however they may live, lest they lose all.

A spurious sermon, attributed to Augustine (de Tempore, 219) is wholly on the duty of paying tithes. God who has given the whole condescends to demand back the tithes. This is enforced by Malachi iii. and Exodus xxx. God is wont to reduce to a tithe those who withhold tithes. For tithes are sought as a debt, and he who has refused to give them has invaded the property of other men. He, therefore, who wishes to gain reward or to merit indulgence for sin, let him pay tithe, and out of the nine parts as well, be zealous to give alms to the poor.

Other spurious documents are—a canon of Damasus, a letter of Jerome to Damasus, and later, a decretal of Gelasius, and some canons of Orleans and Seville (Selden, ch. v.).

Chrysostom (Hom. iv. in Eph. ii.) says that the Jews paid two tithes, whereas, now, a man observes to him with astonishment, "So-and-so gives tithes! Is not this shameful? If under the law it were dangerous to neglect tithes, consider how great a danger there is now."

Some writers quote also Hom. xxxv. in Genesis, and Hom. xviii. on the Acts; but in both these places decimas is found only in the Latin translation for ἀπαρχάς.

A homily on Luke xviii. 12, attributed to Eusebius of Emessa (c. A.D. 430) says that the payment of tithes is a very good and laudable practice.

Cassian (Collat. Abbat. Theonae xxi.) tells us that in Egypt many persons offered tithes and first-fruits to the famous old man, abbat John (c. 1). This is the earliest instance of the gift of tithes to a monastery. Yet they were not regarded as legally due, for (c. 3) the righteous shew that they are not under the law by exceeding the legal tenth (cf. c. 5); and Christ bids us not to pay tithe, but to sell all (c. 7). Yet, in c. 25, he says, that by the law of Moses a general precept was promulgated ("universo populo"), and we who are bidden (qui praecipimur) to pay tithes of our substance should also pay tithes of our time, and observe the lenten fast (cf. c. 33).

Isidore of Pelusium (c. A.D. 440), lib. i. Epist. 317, writes to count Hermin that he does great honour to the Lord by paying first-fruits and tithes, and will, as a reward, enjoy much prosperity here and eternal happiness hereafter.

The evidence belonging to this period would seem to shew that payment of tithe was first regarded as a duty soon after A.D. 350. By that time the idea generally prevailed that the priest of the Christian church had succeeded to the office of the Levitical priests, and consequently to their rights and privileges. Ambrose was the first exponent of this duty. Augustine and Jerome waver, partly influenced by the new ideas, partly mindful of the perfect freedom of Christian charity. In the East this doctrine seems to have made very little progress; Chrysostom shews that it was rarely practised. Epiphanius completely rejects it, Eusebius can say no more than that it is a good practice, Isidore is grateful; even the monk who accepts and enjoins tithes is mindful of a higher law than the Mosaic.

Hom. 2, says not only are tithes not our own, but belonging to the church, but also all we have is from God, and therefore we ought to give to the poor (cf. Lev. xiv. and xxxvii., where he quotes chiefly from Augustine). Eupippius (Vita S. Severani, c. 17, § 18), c. A.D. 510, says that in Pannonia tithes were zealously paid—"quod mandatum licet cunctis ex lege notissimum sit," was taught there by the saint. A famine which happened was thought to be the punishment of neglect of tithes. When the Lombards were threatening Italy, one instance given of their savage habits was that they did not pay tithes (Greg. Turon. i. 6). Anastasius Sinaita (A.D. 544), in his Dux Vitae, question 13, asks what proportion of his goods a man ought to offer to God. The answer is, "If he who gives half [referring to Zacchaeus] does nothing, quanti erit is qui ne decimam quidem praebet?"

In a synodical letter written after the second council of Tours, A.D. 567, the faithful are exhorted to follow the example of Abraham and pay tithes.

Thus for two hundred years, the doctrine of the obligation of tithe had been making its way, but still remained only a pious opinion, unenforced by any decree of emperor or council.

At length, in A.D. 585, the council of Mâcon, eager to take away the causes of the decay of the church, recites how the divine laws had ordered the payment of tithes that the clergy might be left free to their sacred duties: "Quas leges Christianorum congeries longis temporibus custodivit intemeratas. Nunc autem paulatim praevaricatores legum pene Christiani omnes ostenduntur, dum ea quae divinitus sancita sunt adimplere negligunt." Wherefore for the future all are to pay tithes, which the priests may spend also in redeeming captives or aiding the poor. All who refuse are liable to excommunication.

Selden says this canon is not in the oldest collections. Agobard, bishop of Lyons, certainly writes as if he had never seen it. Gregory the Great (Hom. xvi. in Evang.) says: "As ye are bidden by the law to pay tithes of property, so strive to offer Him also tithes of days."

About A.D. 660, Marculphus collected all legal forms relating to land; but there is no form for charging land with tithe. But the constant exhortations of the clergy began at last to produce permanent results.

Towards the end of the 7th century grew up the custom of making tithe a permanent charge upon land. The council of Arles (iv. c. 9, A.D. 513) orders "ut ecclesiae antiquitus constitutae nec decimis nec ulla possessione priventur." This does not require an earlier date; 130 years would fully satisfy "antiquitus constitutae."

In A.D. 680, "decimacula in Rodolfi curte—that is, a tithe of small value, in a place called Rodolph's Court—was consecrated to the church of Arras.

The Ethiopian Missal, which dates from about this time, has a form of prayer: "Rogemus pro iis qui obtulerunt munera sanctae unice quae est super omnes ecclesiae sacrificium scilicet primitiarum decimarum, gratiarum actionis signum et monumentum."

A.D. 720, Eadbert, bishop of Lindisfarne, was noted for his charities, so that, says Bede (Hist. Eccl. iv. 29), he used, according to the law of Moses, every year to give tithes, not only of beasts, but of corn and fruits, and of clothes for the poor. Bede also says (super Exod. quaest. c. 36) that ten is the number of perfection, and as in first-fruits we make a beginning, so in tithes we are ordered to perfect our work.

In his Scintillae, or common places (xxix.), he quotes from Malachi and other texts in favour of paying tithe; also from the spurious sermon De Tempore, 219 (vide supra Augustine).

Also in a sermon on Luke xvi. (Dom. ix. post Trin.), he urges his hearers to give half their goods, as Zacchaeus, or at least two-tenths, so as to surpass the Jews.

In A.D. 742, Pipin confirms to the abbey of Fulda all grants of tithe past or future; and in A.D. 750 he gives to the church of St. Monon a tithe of land.

There is no foundation for the story that Charles Martel granted the tithes to his knights in A.D. 740, and that they were restored at the synod of Ratisbon, A.D. 742.

A.D. 745, Boniface of Mentz, writing to Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, speaks of the clergy as receiving tithes.

A.D. 750, the Exceptiones of Egbert, archbishop of York, make mention of tithes. No. 4, the priest is to teach his people to pay tithes of all their property. No. 5, the priests are to receive tithes and write down the names of those who pay them; they are to be divided into three parts—for church ornament, for the poor, for the clergy. No. 99 refers to the Mosaic law of tithe. No. 100 quotes from Augustine a passage exhorting a tithe to be paid of all sources of income.

Though tithes were now generally paid, they were still quite voluntarily, for the canon of Mâcon seems to have become obsolete even in its own province. But it was now determined to coerce the reluctant.

Of the capitularies of Charlemagne many refer to tithe, but most are later than A.D. 800.

A.D. 778, Charles the Great ordered tithes to be paid throughout his kingdom (Capit. v. 123); payment is to be enforced by excommunication or by the civil magistrate (v. 46). Herardus of Tours, at the same time forbids his clergy to use other than the milder methods of persuasion and warning.

Capit. vii. anni xi. A.D. 779—"Concerning tithes, let each man give a tenth, and let it be dispensed at the command of the bishop."

A.D. 787, the council of Calcuith (c. xvii.) quotes the law and Malachi, and orders tithe to be paid of everything.

A.D. 793, Offa, king of the Mercians, gave tithes of all, to expiate the treacherous murder of Ethelbert.

The council of Friuli, A.D. 791 (canon xiv.), says that there is no better teaching concerning tithes than Malachi iii.

The council of Frankfort, A.D. 794 (canon xxv.), orders all who hold benefices of the church to pay tithes and ninths, and every man is to pay the lawful tithe to the church.

Yet towards the close of this period Agobard, bishop of Lyons, in a treatise on the dispensation of church revenue (p. 276), expressly denies that before his time any synod or church fathers had determined any fixed quantity as due of necessity. From his position he must have had every opportunity of knowing the canon of Mâcon. About the same time Alcuin (Epist. vii.) presses upon Charles the Great the expediency of exacting tithe from such weak Christians as the newly conquered Huns. This he could scarcely do if tithes were generally regarded as of divine obligation.

Though the payment of tithes was always based upon the law of Moses, the duty was extended beyond the Mosaic precept (cf. Luke xviii. 12).

There was no limitation as to the kind of property of which tithes were paid.

Origen speaks only of annual produce; Ambrose, of grain, wine, fruits, cattle, business, hunting; Augustine, of income, of annual fruits, or daily gains. The spurious sermon commands tithes of anything whereby the man lives—warfare, business, or trade. So an epistle of the bishops of the province of Tours, A.D. 567, exhorts payment of tithes of all property, and even of slaves. Eadbert, bishop of Lindisfarne, gave tithes of fruits, quadrupeds, and clothes.

Similarly, whereas the Mosaic law granted tithes to the Levites, in the church they were claimed not for the clergy alone, but for the poor also.

The persons for whose benefit tithes were given were the clergy, says Irenaeus; Jerome, the poor, the priests and Levites. The Apostolic Constitutions claim them for the orphan and the widow, for the poor and the proselyte; "for the other clerics" (the bishops, priests and deacons were to be supported by the first-fruits) and for the virgins. The council of Mâcon decrees them for the clergy, the poor, and for the redemption of captives. In Cassian, we see tithe paid to monks, and in a capitulary of the fourth year of Charlemagne to monasteries.

Thus in two points the advocates of tithes went beyond the law upon which they based their claim.

At what time parochial tithes were separated from the mother church and affixed to the parish church does not appear. Selden (chap. xii. on Tithes) says that in the Saxon times we find "ecclesiae" simply, and not until the Norman dynasty "ecclesiae cum decimis."

TITULUS. (1) In pagan usage an inscription on a stone; later, the stone which marked the boundary of property.

(2) In the time of Trajan it meant the limits of the jurisdiction of presbyters at Rome. This is the germ of that meaning which title bears in ecclesiastical practice.

(3) Sphere of work for orders. [ORDERS, HOLY, p. 1486; PARISH, p. 1556.]

Closely allied to this sense of Titulus is the application of the term to some churches in Rome. Some of the churches there were called tituli, and some were not. Of pope Marcellus (A.D. 308), it is said he appointed in the city of Rome twenty-five "tituli, quasi dioceses." This last expression might suggest a correspondence, with the idea of "mother churches." And this would support Bingham's view, which he takes from Mede (Discourse of Churches), that the name titulus was given to certain churches, because they gave a title of cure or denomination to presbyters to whom they were committed (Bingham, Antiq. viii. i. 10). Succeeding popes, —Silvester, Damasus, Innocent—appointed each a titulus in Rome; so that in the time of Alexander the Third, they are spoken of as being twenty-eight in number (Anast. Vit. Pontif.). Another reason for the name titulus, as applied to the church, is suggested by Baronius (an. 112). The sign of the cross, which was inscribed upon them, was the titulus by which they were known to belong to Christ, just as imperial property was declared to be such by the imperial mark (titulus fiscalis) affixed to it.

From meaning the whole church the term titulus was sometimes applied to a part of the church, (a) a chapel in which the bones of a saint reposed, and (b) the sanctuary (presbyterium, βῆμα) or part which contained the altar. The churches called tituli were distinguished from the others, which were called diaconiae, oratoria; and, as being the principal churches of the city, were called tituli cardinales or simply cardinales, the priests who were attached to them being called presbyteri cardinales. TOLEDO, COUNCILS OF (TOLETANA CONCILIA). No less than 21 councils are said to have been held at Toledo, between A.D. 400 and 701, when they were stopped as abruptly by the invasion of Spain by the Moors, as they had commenced on its conquest by the Visigoths. But the genuineness of the two first, as now given, is more than doubtful, for the reasons which follow. The authorities to be consulted more particularly, besides Mansi and Hefele, are the Collect. Max. Conc. Hisp. by Cardinal Aguirre (Catalan's ed.); Collect. Can. Eccl. Hisp. by Gonzalez, Madrid, 1808; and more recently, with notes by M. Tejada y Ramiro.

(1) A.D. 400, or, as another reading has it, 397, when 19 bishops are said to have met and passed 20 canons. But appended to these canons is, first, a rule of faith followed by 18 anathemas, which, as we shall see, was made by a later and southern council. Some professions come next, which are called the professions of bishops Symphosius and Dictinnius, of happy memory; who certainly would have been dead by then. But, again, the definitive sentence, which comes last of all, must have been passed during their lifetime. Now, the two first documents, necessarily, can have no connexion with a council of this date; nor the third, for another reason, viz. that neither Symphosius nor Dictinnius appear among the subscribers to those 20 canons on discipline that come first. Nor, lastly, can pope Innocent have corresponded with this council, as he is supposed to have done (Mansi, iii. 1063, et seq.), for he was not pope till two years afterwards. On the other hand, Idatius, bishop of Chaves, who was contemporary with St. Leo, says in his Chronicon (Migne, Patr. 41, 876), that, during the pontificate of Anastasius, "a council of bishops met at Toledo, in which, as stated in its acts, Symphosius and Dictinnus and other bishops of the province of Galicia with them, subscribed to the condemnation of Priscillian, whom they had once followed; certain observances of ecclesiastical discipline were decreed; and Ortigius, bishop of Celene, who had been exiled by the Priscillianists, was present and took part." This statement lends positive countenance to the third of these documents; but none whatever to the 20 canons that come first; for it is of course quite possible for the council at which Symphosius and Dictinnus were present to have passed canons on discipline, yet not these. True, there is a bishop Ortizio, or Orticius, who subscribes to these; but nothing is said by the president to shew there was anything special in his case. Again, the 14th of these canons bears a close resemblance to the 3rd of the first council of Saragossa, A.D. 381, but it might have been just as well passed 40 years later as 21 years earlier. The mention of the quotidianum sacrificium, in the fifth of them affords a fair presumption that they were framed in Spain (Bingham, Ant. xv. 9, 4), yet there is a curious resemblance between the names of the last bishop subscribing to them, Exuperantius and Exuperius, bishop of Toulouse, with whom Innocent I. corresponded (Mansi, ib. p. 1038), which will at least be worth calling to mind further on. All the pieces are given by Mansi, iii. 997-1015, which the authors of L'Art de Vérifier les Dates only confuse further, in attempting to explain; and which the most recent editor of Spanish canons, M. Tejada y Ramiro, discusses at great length, after cardinal Aguirre, but alike fails to clear up.

(2) A.D. 405, according to Mansi (ib. p. 1161), and Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 470), or 407 according to others, for the mere purpose, that is, of bearing out the letter of Innocent I. already noticed. But as, 1, no such synod occurs in either the Isidorian or the pseudo-Isidorian collections; and 2, no such letter is ascribed to Innocent by Dionysius Exiguus; and further, as, 3, this letter in the Isidorian and pseudo-Isidorian collections is addressed to a synod of Toulouse, and is much shorter and vastly less explicit on disorders in Spain, than the longer version of it published by Sirmondus in his collection of the synods of Gaul, we may well doubt which deserves most credit, the letter, or the synod. The similarity between the names of the last subscriber to the canons of the former council, and the bishop of Toulouse with whom Innocent corresponded has been already pointed out, and is worth considering. According to the Isidorian and pseudo-Isidorian collections, the second council of Toledo was not till A.D. 527, when 8 bishops met and passed 5 canons, but between this and the supposed council of A.D. 405, another of A.D. 447, distinct from or identical with a general council of Spain, supposed to have been held this year, has been inserted (Mansi, vi. 491-494), the only ground for either being another papal letter, which even Cave will not dispute (Hist. Lit. i. 440). But this letter (Ep. xv. of St. Leo, ad Turribium Asturiensem episcopum, according to Mansi, v. 1286) is open to grave doubts, affecting not merely the alleged synod of its own date, but also that of A.D. 527. For the three local accounts of it are far from consistent. 1. Idatius, a contemporary, says in his Chronicon, that the writings of St. Leo against the Priscillianists were brought to the Spanish bishops by Pervincus, deacon of bishop Turribius; among which was a full discourse addressed to Turribius himself, on the observance of the Catholic faith, and on the blasphemies of the heresies; to which some Gallicians, however, gave but a treacherous assent (Migne, ib. 882). 2. Lucretius, president of the first council of Braga, then metropolis of Galicia, A.D. 563 (Mansi, ix. 774), says that Leo forwarded his writings against the Priscillianists to a synod of Galicia by a notary of his own see, Turribius; and that by his order the bishops of Tarragona, Carthage, Portugal, and Andalusia, having assembled themselves in council, drew up a rule of faith, with chapters appended, against the Priscillianists, which was sent to Balconius, then bishop of Braga, and read out now. Lucretius thus makes Turribius, not a correspondent, but a courier, of St. Leo; not a bishop, but a notary. He says further, that the writings of St. Leo were addressed not to a bishop, but to a council then sitting in the north; and that, afterwards, a southern, not a general, council was held at his instance, where the rule of faith was drawn up and sent to Braga, which was now read at Braga. But would not the writings of St. Leo have been read out there too, had they been then extant? 3. Montanus, who was bishop of Toledo, and presided in the alleged synod of A.D. 571, speaks, in the first of the epistles ascribed to him, not of any letter of St. Leo, but of books addressed to St. Leo by a most blessed and religious bishop Turribius (in these documents his see is never once named); yet, that the second of the epistles ascribed to Montanus himself is addressed also to a pious bishop Turribius, is proved incontestably by the words vester coepiscopus fecit (Mansi, viii. 791), which cardinal Aguirre must have been napping not to have noticed. This clumsy forgery, which must have been concocted before the middle of the 7th century to have imposed on St. Ildefonsus (de Vir. Illust. c. 3), only makes the inconsistency between the two former accounts doubly perplexing; and it is further enhanced by the fact that while the Isidorian collection includes both the letter of St. Leo and the two letters of Montanus, the pseudo-Isidorian collection ignores all three. Let the author of the false Decretals have credit for superior discernment for once. The letters of Montanus destroy each other without more ado; similarly, that of Leo to Turribius has only to be compared with the alleged letter of Turribius to Ceponius and Idatius (Mansi, v. 1302), and it will be seen that while both affect the papal in tone, one is not really more papal than the other. Baluzius had more reason for his suspicion than he liked to avow (ib. vi. 491), and cardinal Aguirre can find nothing to oppose to it, but the antiquity of a MS. (ib. 492). The main upshot of it all, however, is, that in neither of these collections, nor in any of these documents, is there the smallest evidence for a second synod of Toledo before A.D. 527; and as for the acts of the alleged synod of that date, besides being prejudiced by the two letters ascribed to its president, they betray far too much special pleading for the metropolitan rights of that see to inspire confidence. (Comp. Card. Aguirre, Diss. tom. iii. 48 et seq.; art. GALLICIA, COUNCIL OF, p. 708; and the alleged synod of T. A.D. 610, below.)

(3) A.D. 589. Of this council there can be no doubt whatever, except as to its being the third, and as to its principal ruling having been founded on a misapprehension. As 68 bishops or their representatives subscribed to it, every see, whether of Spain, Portugal, or Narbonne, then in existence, must have been represented there; and as each bishop in subscribing appends the name of his see, the subscriptions are worth a careful study. It is the metropolitan of Merida who subscribes second—perhaps as being the oldest—and the metropolitan of Toledo subscribes third; but he who subscribes first is the king. Reccared, king of the Goths, summoned it to celebrate his own conversion, and that of his queen and people, from Arianism; and he and his queen commence proceedings in it by making profession of their orthodoxy, and reciting the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople, as the faith professed by the Catholic church throughout the whole world, and then subscribing to them, and to the definition of the council of Chalcedon, in their own names. In reciting the creed of Constantinople, translated into Latin, they insert, according to the reading of some MSS. the words, “and from the Son,” in describing the Procession of the Holy Ghost. Eight bishops, a number of presbyters, deacons, and of the high nobility, converts from Arianism, likewise, follow with their profession; in which besides reciting the two creeds, and the definition of Chalcedon, like their sovereign, they anathematise twenty-three different errors, the third of which is that of those who deny the Procession of the Holy Ghost to be from the Father and the Son. Regulations for discipline come next by order of the king, embodied in 23 lengthy canons. Among the subscribers to them, and to the acts of the council in general, are those bishops whose abjuration had just been made, with the king at their head, who subscribes first; and as no king, probably, before or since: “I, king Flavius Reccared, in confirmation of these matters, which with the holy synod we have defined, have subscribed.” Each bishop after him meekly says, “I have subscribed assenting to these constitutions.” So that this addition to the creed, and doctrine involved in it, was originally defined, in point of fact, by a convert prince at the head of the same council that received his abjuration. On the other hand, in the 2nd of these very canons we read: “The holy synod ordains that throughout all the churches of Spain and Galicia, according to the form of the oriental churches, the creed of the council of Constantinople, that is, of the 150 fathers be recited, so that, before the reading of the Lord’s prayer, it may be intoned in a loud voice by the people before communicating.” Thus it would seem, that in anathematising the opponents of the twofold Procession of the Holy Ghost, the council never really contemplated interpolating the creed; but meant in all honesty to adhere to the form of it then used in the East. If, therefore, the interpolation of the creed dates from this council, it was as ignorant an interpolation as its defence has been. At the same time the doctrine meant to be expressed by it had been previously laid down in the rule of faith transmitted to Balconius, and endorsed in the so-called letter of Leo to Turribius; unless these documents have likewise received additions. But how, on the other hand, is the omission of all reference to the fifth council by Reccared and his bishops to be explained? Having been held A.D. 553, it was then thirty-six years old. And the pen of St. Gregory the Great with which he congratulated his friend Leander on the conversion of Reccared (Ep. i. 43, Indict. ix.), must have been dipped in the same ink with which he wrote to the Eastern patriarchs shortly before: “Quintum concilium pariter venerator” (ib. Ep. 25). Leander was in all probability grandson of Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, and educated in his dominions. He may thus have sided with the bishops of Aquileia and Istria on that subject, rather than with Rome. At all events, neither at this, nor any subsequent council of Toledo, was the fifth council so much as named. Proceedings were wound up by a glowing review of them in the shape of a homily from Leander, metropolitan of Seville, who had acted as tutor to the king, and corresponded with pope Gregory whom he had known at Constantinople (Mansi, ix. 997–1010).

A.D. 597, where Massona, metropolitan of Merida, subscribes first again; the metropolitan of Narbonne, second; the metropolitan of Toledo, third. It is called a council of 16 bishops, but only 13 subscribe. And it passed only 2 canons, the 1st of which, relating to the celibacy of the clergy, cardinal Aguirre says, “difficillimus intellectu est,” but he omits to add that this council is unknown both to the Isidorian and pseudo-Isidorian collections, and has not been known anywhere as the fourth council. It is transcribed from Loaisa by Mansi without comment (x. 477).

A.D. 610. But this, again, with the alleged edict of Gundemar confirming it, is unknown to both Isidorian collections, like the last, besides which, the plea set forth in it for the metropolitan rights of this see shews too palpably the use which it was designed to serve, and this its reference to the alleged council under Montanus only further confirms, so that even Mansi says its genuineness is a question which he leaves to the most learned to decide (x. 511). Nothing else purports to have been discussed at it; the petitions appended to it are, therefore, beyond explanation.

(4) A.D. 633, which is called everywhere the fourth council. Here the metropolitan of Toledo subscribes only fifth, and the metropolitan of Merida third, after the metropolitan of Narbonne; while the metropolitan of Seville, St. Isidore, who had succeeded his brother Leander in that see, presides. It passed no less than 75 canons, and no less than 69 bishops or their representatives subscribed to them. The first, headed “De evidenti Catholicæ fidei veritate,” dogmatises on the Trinity and Incarnation in language that every now and then exhibits phrases common to the Athanasian creed, and ends similarly, "Haec est Catholicae ecclesiae fides: hanc confessionem conservamus atque tenemus, quam quisquis firmissime custodierit, perpetuam salutem habebit. . . ." The provision made by the next for divine service is no less noteworthy—"Unus ordo orandi atque psallendi a nobis per omnem Hispaniam atque Galliam conservetur, unus modus in missarum solemnitatibus, unus in vespertinis matutinisque officiis; nec diversa sit ultra in nobis ecclesiastica consuetudo, qui in una fide continemur et regno, hoc enim et antiqui canones decreverunt: ut unaquaque provincia et psallendi et ministrandi parem consuetudinem teneat. . . ." There is no reference whatever to the customs or the tenets of the church of any country besides their own in either canon. If, owing to circumstances, says the 3rd, councils cannot meet twice a year—juxta antiqua patrum decreta—they should at least be held once, general or provincial, as the case may require. All the other canons are conceived in the same spirit. Of the last book of the Bible the 17th says: "Apocalypsis librum multorum conciliorum auctoritas, et synodica sanctorum praesulum Romanorum decreta Joannis evangelistae esse praescribunt, et inter divinos libros recipiendum constituerunt. . . ." The 21st, entitled, "De castitate sacerdotum," leaves the question of marriage untouched, and is content to say, "Inoffensos igitur et immaculatos decet Dei existere sacerdotes, nec ullo eos fornicationis contagio pollui. . . ." The 57th commences a series of ordinances about Jews in these words: "De Judaeis hoc praeceptum sancta synodus: nemini deinceps ad credendum vim inferre . . . non enim tales inviti salvandi sunt, sed volentes; ut integra sit forma justitiae. . . ." And the seventy-second says of those slaves who have been emancipated, "A cujusbet insolentia protegantur; sive in statu libertatis eorum, seu in peculio quod habere noscuntur. . . ." The writings of St. Isidore afford the best clue to the comprehensive character of these enactments (Mansi, x. 611-50). Compare, for instance, can. 57 with what is said of Sisebute (Chron. aera DCL.).

(5) A.D. 636, "Diversis ex provinciis Hispaniae" is what they say of themselves; and it is a fact that 2 or 3 bishops of the provinces of Tarragona, Portugal, and Narbonne figure among the subscribers to it; but all the rest of the 24 subscribing or represented bishops were suffragans of Toledo, whose metropolitan, Eugenius, is found, for the first time, subscribing first. The "diversis ex provinciis," whether regular or not, few or many, did homage to the occasion. No rival metropolitan was present. Eugenius subscribed himself: "Dei miseratione Toletanae ecclesiae provinciae Carthaginis metropolitanus," a style contrasting with his meek subscription but two years afterwards, when his see was again eclipsed. All of the 9 canons now passed have reference to existing disorders in the state (Mansi, x. 6538-8).

(6) A.D. 638, when the metropolitan of Narbonne presided, and Eugenius subscribed third, after the metropolitan of Braga, but before the then metropolitan of Seville, Honoratus. No less than 53 bishops, or their representatives, subscribe to the 18 canons now passed, the first of which is entitled, "De plenitudine fidei Catholicae," and embodies a disquisition on the Trinity and Incarnation about three times as long as the 1st canon of the tenth council under St. Isidore, yet borrowing on the Procession from his account of the third council under Reccared (Chron. aera DCXXIV.) as clearly as their 3rd canon—"De custodia fidei Judaeorum" departs from his spirit. Of the rest about half concern the state rather than the church, and the thanks of the council are voted to king Chintila for having called them together (Mansi, x. 659-674).

(7) A.D. 646, under king Chindasvinda, who dethroned the son of the summoner of the previous council. Here the metropolitan of Merida presides, and Eugenius of Toledo (strangely left out in Mansi) subscribes third once more, but this time after the metropolitan of Seville (Antonius), who had succeeded Honoratus since the previous council, and therefore must have been his junior. Thus the hypothesis of cardinal Aguirre making precedence depend on seniority breaks down here; for it was not Eugenius II. but Eugenius I. who was present, as we learn from St. Ildefonso (Vir. Illust. c. 13). But 6 canons were passed on this occasion, and the 1st of them, instead of expounding the faith, is headed, "De refugis atque perfidis clericis sive laicis," whose case is discussed at very great length. The rest are not of more lasting interest. Forty-one bishops or their representatives subscribe to them. (Mansi, x. 763-74.) Another council is appended by him to this in the next page, on no better evidence than because certain duties ascribed to archdeacons and other functionaries in the first book of Decretals (tit. 23-4), are there headed, "Ex concilio Toletano." But on this, see Bingham, ii. 21, 8.

(8) A.D. 653, where the metropolitan of Merida presides again, and a second Eugenius of Toledo subscribes third, after Antonius of Seville. Abbats here subscribed for the first time, signing between bishops and their representatives, and laymen of rank similarly for the first time, signing last. Twelve lengthy canons, in the 1st of which the creed of Constantinople is professed in its interpolated form, were passed, "d'un style si diffus et si figuré, qu'il n'est point aisé de les entendre," as the authors of L'Art de Vérifier les Dates truly say; 62 bishops or their representatives subscribed to them. King Recesvinda heads them with a lengthy profession of his own to which he subscribes himself, and the bishops supplement them with a decree respecting his goods and chattels, which he finally confirms (Mansi, x. 1205-1228).

(9) A.D. 655, where the second Eugenius subscribes first, adopting a new style, "Regiae urbis metropolitani episcopus"; and from this time, whether it was a general or provincial gathering, the metropolitan of Toledo presides always at councils held in his own metropolis, and signs first. On this occasion, indeed, no other metropolitan was present. Seventeen canons, all on discipline, were passed, and signed by 16 bishops and the representative of a 17th; 8 abbats and 4 counts complete the list. The heading of the last canon, "Ut baptizati Judaei cum episcopis celebrent dies festos," shews what course legislation had taken on that subject since the days of St. Isidore (Mansi, xi. 23-32).

(10) A.D. 656, when 3 metropolitans were present, and the second Eugenius again presides and signs first. This was the first general council at which this had occurred. Only 7 canons were passed, and 20 bishops and 25 episcopal representatives alone subscribe to them. Yet this council deposed Potamius, metropolitan of Braga, whose name appears among the subscribers to the eighth council, on his own confession of a crime committed by him, and appointed Fructuosus, one of his suffragans, in his stead. It also transferred the festival of the Annunciation to Dec. 18, by an express canon, on the ground that it clashed so frequently with Lent or Easter that its due observance was compromised (Mansi, xi. 32-46).

(11) A.D. 675, at an interval of nineteen years from the preceding one, during nine years of which the see of Toledo was filled by St. Ildefonso, nephew to the last prelate, and pupil of St. Isidore. Why no council should have met in his day is a question to which more than one answer might be returned. This, however, is what the 16 bishops who met under his successor, Quiricus, on this occasion, say on the subject: "Eramus huc usque pro labentis seculi colluvione instabiles, quia annosa series temporum, subtracta luce conciliorum, non tam vitia auxerat, quam matrem omnium errorum ignorant otiosis mentibus ingerebat." This is in the preface to their own proceedings, which ends with a lengthy paraphrase of the faith of the first four councils, and is followed by 16 canons, the 6th of which begins as follows: "His a quibus Domini sacramenta tractanda sunt, iudicium sanguinis agitare non licet." Yet the very next canon contemplates bishops pronouncing sentences of exile and prison against offenders, if nothing worse (Mansi, xi. 129-152).

(12) A.D. 681, at which king Ervigius was present to open proceedings and make known his wishes, Julian metropolitan of Toledo subscribing first, the metropolitans of Seville, Braga, and Merida, being present, and subscribing after him to 13 canons then passed: in the 1st of which, after a profession of the faith of the first four councils, and a recital of the interpolated creed, the resignation of king Wamba and the accession of king Ervigius is declared to have been duly received and authenticated. Whereupon both acts are confirmed by the council, and all who had taken oaths of allegiance to the one are released from them in favour of the other; "Le premier exemple d'une pareille entreprise des évêques," as the authors of L'Art de Vérifier les Dates say of it. The pendant to it is contained in the 6th canon, whose title runs thus: "De concessâ Toletano pontifici generalis synodi potestate, ut episcopi alterius provinciae cum conventiâ principum in urbe regiâ ordinentur." The 9th canon enumerates and ordains a series of severe enactments against the Jews to be made more stringent than ever. By the 10th protection is assured to all who have taken sanctuary; the 11th shews that worshippers of idols were by no means extinct in Spain at that date. Thirty-five bishops, 3 representatives of absent bishops and abbats, and 15 nobles, subscribe to them. Afterwards, in the editions of councils, follows an edict of king Ervigius confirming them all. But in the Isidorian collection the first part of this edict is omitted, and appended to the second is the long edict of king Gundemar, said to have been issued in confirmation of the alleged council of A.D. 610, neither of which, as stated already, were before given in this collection, each setting forth the privileges of this see. In the pseudo-Isidorian collection only the second part of the edict of king Ervigius follows these canons, and that of Gundemar appears nowhere (Mansi, xi. 1023-1044).

(13) A.D. 683, when king Ervigius was again present, and retired after stating his wishes and handing in his address. Thirteen canons or chapters, as they are called from the tenth council onwards—and their length alone warrants the distinction—were then passed, after the faith of the first four councils had been professed and the interpolated creed recited, determining civil questions with as much freedom as ecclesiastical, and beginning with them in fact. Canon 5, which concludes this branch, forbids anybody to marry the widow of the king. Canon 9 confirms the twelfth council anew, while reciting the confirmation given to it at the time by Ervigius. The subscription to them of Julian, who subscribes first, is peculiar: "Ego Julianus indignus sanctae ecclesiae Toletanae metropolitanus episcopus instituta a nobis definita subscripsi." All the rest, 3 metropolitans and 44 bishops, merely subscribe their names and sees. Eight abbats, 27 representatives of absent bishops, 2 of whom were metropolitans, and 26 nobles complete the list. King Flavius Ervigius follows with his ratification (Mansi, xi. 1059-1082).

(14) A.D. 684, when 16 bishops of the province of Cartagena met under Julian of Toledo, their metropolitan; 6 abbats, and 2 representatives from each of the metropolitans of Tarragona, Narbonne, and Merida; 1 from each of the metropolitans of Braga and Seville, and 2 from absent suffragans of Toledo, being also present and subscribing. They had been ordered by king Ervigius, as they say in their 1st canon, to assemble thus, "ob confutandum Apollinaris dogma pestiferum," concerning which a communication had reached them, "a Romano praesule;" so that whatever they might decide thereon the metropolitans of other provinces, apprised of it by their representatives, might be able to enforce by means of their own provincial synods throughout Spain and Galicia. They therefore proceed to discuss this question in all its bearings, "quibus Romanae sedis fueramus literis invitati." The 2nd canon adds that the courier of the Roman prelate had also brought with him the acts of a council held at Constantinople under the then Emperor Constantine; and that by the courteous letter of the pontiff of ancient Rome they were invited, "ut praedicta synodalia instituta quae miserat, nostri etiam rigoris manerent auctoritate suffulta; omnibusque per nos sub regno Hispaniae consistentibus patecerent dirurganda." This task is accordingly taken in hand by them forthwith; and finding these acts, on examination, to be quite consistent with the faith of the four first councils, they resolve as follows in their 7th canon: "Post Chalcedonense concilium haec debito honore, loco, et ordine, collocanda sunt: ut cujus gloriosae themate fulgent, ei et loci et ordinis coaptentur honore." Even so, they cannot let the opportunity slip of dogmatising on the same points themselves, which occupies five more canons, to the exclusion of every other subject. It is difficult to say which is found the greater crux by Roman Catholics of modern times, this council or the papal epistles that gave rise to it. From this council we learn—1. That gesta synodalia of the sixth council were duly received in Spain from the then pope, Leo II., which of course necessitates their having been translated into Latin under his auspices, as his own letter contemplates and his own biographer expressly states (Mansi, xi. 1047, 1052). 2. That this council considered itself free to examine and only receive them on their being found orthodox. 3. That this council, by its manner of receiving them, distinctly testified its continued non-acceptance of the fifth council, though the pope, in his epistle to the bishops of Spain, had called them particularly the acts of the sixth council, and named five universal councils in addition (see above, council under Reccared, A.D. 589). From the papal epistles we learn that the Spanish bishops and their king Ervigius had the condemnation of Honorius of Rome by the sixth council formally notified to them by his then successor. G. Loaisa dares not impugn the genuineness of these letters; on the contrary, the MS. containing them has others, according to him, of the next pope, Benedict II., no less useful for throwing light on this council. If so, why were they not all published? Mansi prints but one and passes off one of the letters of Leo for another (ib. 1085–1086). Cardinal Aguirre reprints them timidly without a word from himself. Others content themselves with pronouncing them spurious or interpolated in general terms (Mansi, ib. 1050–1058, and CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCILS OF, p. 446). No confirmation of this council by the king is appended to it (Mansi, ib. 1085–1092).

(15) A.D. 688, when king Egica was present, opened proceedings, and handed in an address on withdrawing; after which the bishops reiterate their adherence to the faith of the first four councils, and recite the interpolated creed. They then proceed to their real business, which is curious in the extreme. Julian, their president, had sent a work entitled Liber de tribus Substantiis, to Rome, which the then pope, Benedict II., had criticised in detail and pronounced against. He had likewise condemned one expression in their own dogmatic profession which had accompanied it. The council unhesitatingly vindicates both by passages from the fathers, and in re-affirming them observes with caustic vein: sicut nos non pudebit quae vera sunt defendere, hinc forsitan quosdam pudebit quae vera sunt ignorare. This matter ended, another is settled in the same breath, and with equal freedom, relating to the king. He is formally released from intricacies in the conditions to which the late king had bound him on marrying his daughter. And then 5 metropolitans, 55 bishops, the representatives of 1 metropolitan and 4 more bishops, 8 abbats, 3 superior clergy, and 17 nobles subscribe to its rulings on each head. Naturally king Egica confirms them by a special edict (Mansi, xii. 7–26).

(16) A.D. 693, when king Egica was again present, opened proceedings, and handed in an address on withdrawing, after which the bishops, without any previous reference to the faith or the creed of councils, put forth a long dogmatic statement of their own, in which the points criticised by pope Benedict are once more re-affirmed. At its close, those who depart from the communion of the church or have never joined it, or who reject the faith and decrees of the first councils, are anathematised; and 13 chapters on matters relating to church and state follow. Of these the 1st is headed De Judaeorum perfidia, and refers in high terms of praise to a late ordinance of the king having for its object, quatenus aut convertantur ad fidem, aut in perfidia perdurantes, acerbioribus sedulo mulctentur stimulis. The 6th, which is the last on ecclesiastical matters, is curious for the light it throws on the bread still commonly then used for the Eucharist, and for its own ruling thereon. The 8th is De munimine prolis regiae; the 9th, De Sigeberto episcopo—that is to say, the late metropolitan of Toledo, who had been incarcerated for having conspired against the king. The council therefore deposed him, translating Felix from the see of Seville to succeed him, Faustinus from the see of Braga to succeed Felix, another Felix from the see of Portugal to succeed Faustinus, as the 12th canon relates; and the last canon orders that the metropolitan of Narbonne, who was prevented from being present, should lose no time in convening his suffragans to subscribe to these chapters, which king Egica thereupon confirms. All the newly-appointed metropolitans, with Felix at their head, and the metropolitan of Merida, who alone went as he came, 54 bishops, 5 abbats, 3 representatives of absent bishops, and 16 nobles subscribe to them (Mansi, xii. 59–88).

(17) A.D. 694, when king Egica was once more present, opened proceedings, and handed in an address as before. After this, the bishops commence their part, by reciting the interpolated creed, and proclaiming their adhesion to it. In their 1st canon they further decree that the first three days of every council shall be spent as fasts, and occupied wholly with matters relating to the faith and other spiritual or ecclesiastical matters, to the exclusion of secular persons. Indeed, of the 8 canons now passed, only the 7th, which is headed De munitione conjugis atque prolis regiae, deals with anything else. By the 2nd baptisteries are to be kept locked in Lent, and not opened except for some grave cause. By the 3rd the washing of the feet on Maundy Thursday, which had been intermitted in some churches, is ordered to be revived and everywhere duly performed. By the 5th a pernicious custom of using a mass intended for the repose of the dead on behalf of the living, in order to imperil their lives, is to be punished with lifelong excommunication and imprisonment. By the 6th the general use of litanies in every month of the year decreed of old, is made special for Spain in these terms: “Ut deinceps per totum annum in cunctis duodecim mensibus, per universae Hispaniae et Galliarum provincias, pro statu ecclesiae Dei, pro incolumitate principis nostri atque salvatione populi, et indulgentiâ totius peccati, et a cunctorum fidelium cordibus expulsionem diaboli, exomologesis votis gliscentibus celebretur. . .” with which St. Isidore, de Etym. vi. c. 75–81, may be profitably compared. The heading of the 8th is De Judaeorum damnatione. The usual confirmation of these canons by the king follows; but there are no subscriptions to them (Mansi, xii. 93-108).

(18) A.D. 701.—But there is no earlier authority for it than that of Roderic, archbishop of Toledo in the 13th century; who merely mentions it to add, tamen in corpore canonum non habetur, without giving any particulars of it himself (Mansi, xii. 163-164). After this there is but one more real or conjectural council of Toledo till A.D. 1086, at the earliest, and this is vaguely called by most a "council of Spain;" but as it had Elipandus of Toledo for its president, Mansi thinks it may have been held in his metropolis. The date assigned to it by him is A.D. 793, and it is said to have declared in favour of the views of its president on Adoptionism, and to have defended them by testimonies from the fathers in a synodical epistle addressed to the bishops of France, subsequently refuted at Frankfort (Mansi, xiii. 857-858). TOLERATION, EDICT OF [MARTYR, p. 1125].

TOMBS, TOMBSTONES. From the earliest times the bodies of Christians were interred in places open to the sky (CEMETERY) and in subterranean burial-places* (CATACOMBS). The forms and arrangements of the tombs in the catacombs of Rome and also of Naples are sufficiently described in the latter article. Those in the catacombs of Syracuse, Taormina, Malta, Canopus, and Alexandria,^b are likewise alluded to and hardly require further mention here.^c In the following article an endeavour will be made briefly to notice—

(A) Various kinds of tombs, excluding those mentioned above, found in different countries.^d

(B) Objects found therein.

(C) Select sepulchral inscriptions of all kinds, wherever found.

* M. de Rossi (Rom. Sott. Crist. t. i. p. 87, Rom. 1864) announces his preparation for a general work on Christian tombs of both these classes. This most important work has not yet appeared, so far as the writer is aware.

^b Christian catacombs occur also in Milo (Melos), in which vermilion inscriptions, probably of the 4th century, as well as a small stèle, have been found. (Böckh, C. I. G., nos. 9288-9290.)

^c It should perhaps just be mentioned that in countries where catacombs were unknown, some few sepulchral chambers have been discovered underground. De Rossi mentions one found at Rheims in 1738, adorned with pictures, which have perished; and another at the same place which was found and destroyed in 1817 (Rom. Sott. t. i. p. 100): see also Le Blant (Manuel, c. ix.) for a subterranean chamber at Montmartre, under a martyrion. In Palestine, again, we have an example of the same sort; a subterranean chamber thirty feet long, twelve wide, and eight high was discovered in 1854 near Saida (Sidon). On the interior of its whitened walls various figures were drawn in red, and an inscription was written all round below their upper edge, which recorded that the chamber was made "for the memory and the repose of Anarbas and his brother John;" with two passages quoted from Ps. xxiii. and 1 Cor. xv. The date also given in the inscription is rather mutilated, but probably corresponds to A.D. 642 (Böckh, C. I. G., no. 9153).

^d Inscriptions in connexion with the particular tombs mentioned are included under this section.

It may be advisable, however, to make a few preliminary remarks.

The ancient Roman laws of the twelve tables and those of imperial times, from Hadrian to Diocletian, strictly forbade burials to take place in Rome and in cities generally (see the laws quoted by Bingham, Antiq. XXIII. i. § 2). The Christians do not appear ever to have been charged with transgressing these laws, but rather objected the transgression of them to the heathen. It must consequently follow that we cannot expect to find tombs in city churches or in any grounds contiguous to them during the first three centuries. [CHURCHYARDS.] There is, in fact, as yet no literary or archaeological evidence to shew that any Christian burial took place in a church, or that any sepulchral monument was placed in or even near to a church before the death of Constantine (Bingham, u. s.; Muratori, Anecd. t. i., Dissert. xvii. pp. 185-189).^e

Neither does there appear to be a single well-authenticated instance of any burial, nor of any tomb properly so called, in any city whatever during the same period. For although it is stated by Eusebius, following Hegesippus (Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. c. 23), that James the Just, the brother of our Lord, had a tombstone (στήλην)^f erected to him close by the Temple at Jerusalem, on the spot where he was martyred, yet it is far more probable that he was buried on the Mount of Olives, at no great distance indeed, but outside the city walls. This was the opinion of others mentioned by St. Jerome (lib. de Vir. Ill. c. 2); and it appears from the Gospels that it was the custom of the Jews to bury outside the precincts of cities. (Luke vii. 12; John xix. 42; coll. Heb. xiii. 12.)

For these three centuries we have very few sepulchral monuments remaining, with the exception of those in the Roman catacombs, though

^e De Rossi's work on the Roman inscriptions of the first six centuries shews no sepulchral slab placed, or presumed to have been ever placed, in a church or basilica during the first three centuries. There are, however, many epitaphs of the 4th century now or lately to be seen in Roman churches or basilicas, but very few can be counted upon as being in their original sites. One marble slab was found adhering to its sepulchre on the pavement of the basilica of St. Alexander on the Via Nomentana (A.D. 396), and another (A.D. 402) on that of the subterranean basilica of St. Hermes (De Rossi, Nos. 438, 507). Some appear to have been taken from the catacombs (see Nos. 80, 153, 182, 186, 224); but De Rossi considers that this is not the case with others (Nos. 149, 184). The greatest number have occurred in the pavement of the basilica of St. Paul on the Via Ostiensis; it was built, according to Hübsch, A.D. 386, but some of the slabs bear earlier dates, the earliest being A.D. 345 (see Nos. 88, 98, 204, 209, 246, 316, 371), consequently the slabs have been moved from their original sites. This may also have been the case in many other instances.

An early example of a burial in an African basilica will be found in the mosaic of Reparatus, A.D. 475 (see below).

Slabs beautifully decorated with foliage, flowers, etc. occur in the church of Briord, A.D. 487 (Le Blant, no. 379, pl. 43), and in the nave of the cathedral of Vaison, A.D. 515 (Le Blant, no. 492, pl. 66).

^f For the form of the στήλην see Dict. Gr. and Rom. Ant. s. v. "Fusus;" but the word appears to be used somewhat vaguely.

there is abundant evidence that open-air burial-places of various kinds were then in use in many parts of the Christian world. Many of these monuments were doubtless destroyed during the times of persecution (Euseb. H. E. viii. 6). Even of the few which remain some appear to be restorations made in the time of the peace of the church. De Rossi thinks that the celebrated Autun inscription (see Vol. I. p. 806) is one of these. That of Caesarea in Mauretania (Vol. I. p. 848) is unquestionably so. (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. t. i. § iii. I. Cimiteri sopra terra.)

At Rome, and indeed everywhere else for several centuries,^g many tombs, among which some were Christian, were erected in the suburbs by the sides of the principal roads leading into the city. Thus according to Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. i. 5, ed. Sirm.) the burial-place of St. Peter was outside the walls of Rome, a church being still, in his time (A.D. 470), standing over it. St. Jerome says that that apostle was buried in the Via Triumphalis beyond the Tiber, and that St. Paul was buried in the Via Ostiensis, three miles without the gates of the city (u. s. c. 1 and c. 5). Caius, a presbyter of the church of Rome, about the year 210, speaks of these tombs as "the trophies of the apostles" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 25). They were removed about the year 258 into the catacombs, lest some indignity might be offered to them at that time of persecution (Dep. Mart. ap. Pearson, Annal. Cyprian. p. 62). The very fact of their removal shews that they could not have been of very considerable size. They may probably have been cippi bearing inscriptions. Some other monuments belonging to open-air burial-places in the neighbourhood of Rome, which have come down to our times, will be noticed below under Italy.

"Quam antiquitas," says Onuphrius Panvinius (Rit. Sep. Mort. c. vii. ed. Col. 1568), "tantum extra urbem in coemeteriis hominum corpora sepelirentur, pace ecclesiae data intra urbes ad templorum limina, postea in ipsis templis sepeliri mos invaluit." He then gives many examples of burials in or close to churches, which we proceed to cite: the emperor Constantine was buried in the porch of the temple of the apostles at Constantinople, and this is probably the earliest known example of the kind; the emperor Honorius was laid in the porch of St. Peter's church at Rome, and his espoused wife Maria inside the same church; Rotharis, king of the Lombards, was buried in the church of St. John the Baptist at Pavia; king Clotharius in the basilica of St. Vincentius at Paris; Brunichildis, queen of the Franks, in the church of St. Martin at Autun; Charles Martel and his son Pepin in the church of St. Denis at Paris; Charlemagne in the church of St. Mary at Aachen, where a large tombstone bearing his name only, CAROLO MAGNO, is still to be seen. Pope Leo the Great, and many popes after him, were buried in St. Peter's at Rome; St. Benedict, abbot of Casino, in the basilica of St. John the Baptist. But of the character of their tombs, which were probably in most cases of great magnificence, we are unable, with scarcely an exception, to say anything. It may be suspected that some of them were marble sarcophagi, placed either above the ground or possibly below it, of which we have many fine Christian examples yet remaining from the 4th century downwards, more or less elaborately sculptured. [SCULPTURE.] Notwithstanding the examples above named, and some others which might be mentioned [CUBICULUM; OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD, § xiv.], there were several laws of emperors of the 4th and following centuries, and several canons of councils from the 6th century onwards, down to the Council of Mentz in the time of Charlemagne, which distinctly prohibited burials in churches, this last council, however, making certain exceptions (Gretser, de Fun. Christ. ii. 8; Bingham, XXIII. i. §§ 4, 6, 7, 8). There is no doubt that about this time many persons considered it advantageous to their souls to be buried in churches, and Gregory the Great in the 6th century sanctions this opinion. "When heavy sins do not press men down, it is profitable for the dead if they be buried in churches, because their friends, as often as they come thither, remember those whose sepulchres they behold, and offer prayers to the Lord for them" (Dial. lib. iv. c. 50). In spite of this opinion in its favour prohibitions continued to be made not only, as has been said, down to the time of Charlemagne's death, but also as late as A.D. 1076, when a council of Winchester under Lanfranc laid down in its ninth canon that "In ecclesiis corpora defunctorum non sepeliantur." Nor was it until the time of Boniface VIII., about the close of the 13th century, that it was spoken of as a customary thing for men to be buried in a church where their ancestors lay. From his decretals, as Bingham thinks, "may be dated the ruin of the old laws" (u. s. § 9).^h

In what follows little will be said of any tombs which do not now exist, or have not lately been in existence.

(A) General Character of Christian Tombs, exclusive of Catacombs, in various Countries.

ITALY.—Christian tombs of a very early period have been found above ground in Tuscum and elsewhere in the neighbourhood of Rome. De Rossi (Bull. di Arch. Crist. for 1872) has a memoir entitled Il Tuscolo, le Ville Tuscolane e ^h Muratori (u. s. p. 188) holds a brief to shew that burials in churches, in country places at least, had never been regarded as unlawful, and explains away the church canons and imperial laws above referred to as merely designed to prevent overcrowded burials in churches: "quia nimis in aedibus sacris tumulorum cadaverumque moles augebatur, ut propterea coercendi, ex parte fuerint Christiani." But, to say nothing of the fact that the laws and councils make no distinction between town and country churches, the Council of Braga in Spain, about A.D. 563, expressly assigns a very different reason for the prohibition (see can. 18, quoted in OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD, § xvi.). The principal passages on which Muratori relies are from Paulinus (both quoted in CUBICULA) and from St. Ambrose, who desired to be and was buried under the altar in the basilica which he had built at Milan. "Dignum est enim ut ibi requiescat sacerdos, ubi offerre consuerit." (Orat. in SS. Gerv. et Prot. The true reference is to Epist. xxii. p. 877, ed. Bened.) None of his authorities are earlier than the end of the 4th century.

le loro antiche memorie Cristiane, in which he says that he was desirous to find a cippus which had been transcribed by Fabretti, and had been seen many years later, not bearing the patera and simpulum so frequent on pagan cippi, but two anchors, symbolical of Christian hope, a device found on the tombs of the Catacombs. It runs thus: Cl. Irenici | filio dolois | simo cl. Euty | ches avs et cl. Po | thymenys pa | ter et Decia Rv | fina mater fecerent (p. 98). It had been found at Ciampino, in the vicinity of Tusculum. The account of his successful exploration is very interesting (pp. 99, 100).

De Rossi is acquainted with only one other cippus bearing the Christian symbol of the anchor. It seems now to be known merely by the description contained in a MS. of the Vatican (6039, f. 252 verso): Cippus in hortulis S. Sebastiani extra muros P. V. (Petrus Victorius) scripsit. It reads: Marcellae | sanctissi | mae femin | ae Alenni | avs frate | r. Below which are two anchors, that on the left being reversed. "The cippus form of the monument," remarks De Rossi (u. s. p. 99), "if, according to all ordinary rules, it excludes a subterranean origin, does not necessarily exclude its Christianity, because we know that Christian sepulchres still exist above ground which are in the form of cippi" (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1864, pp. 25-32).

But besides isolated tombs in fields or vineyards or by the sides of the public ways, we have in the suburbs of Rome several cemeteries around basilicas which were apparently executed about the 4th century. De Rossi has observed traces of such in various states of preservation in the field above the cemetery of St. Callistus, and in the Agro Verano above that of St. Cyriaca, and in other places. He describes at length and gives a figure of the necropolis above ground under which is the catacomb of St. Callistus (Rom. Sott. lib. iii. pp. 393 sqq. tav. xxxix.). It consists of an assemblage of deep oblong chambers of different dimensions formed by walls made of mixed tufa and brick, intersecting each other at right angles, the tops of which are on the level of the ground. The covers and the bottoms of these chambers were sometimes composed of marble or granite slabs, the lateral walls being left rough; within them bodies were placed one above another in different manners, which De Rossi describes. Sometimes they were only separated by a stone slab, sometimes the bodies were placed in distinct sarcophagi; eight or nine corpses were ordinarily placed one above another. It would appear that only a very few inscriptions, unimportant and undated, have hitherto been found; but the cemetery may be referred to the fourth or fifth century from the style of the work of its walls.¹ He also found above the crypts of St. Lucina a few chambers or fosses, not subdivided like these into horizontal planes and receiving the corpses in their empty spaces, but left open like a well and having loculi excavated in their sides, precisely as in the Catacombs (u. s. p. 404). He gives in fine an account, in the first volume of his Inscript. Christ. Urb. Rom. (p. 108), of a cemetery attached to the Vatican basilica, which was accidentally discovered in the following manner. On September 6, 1689, a horse trod upon and broke the stone which covered the opening to the graves below. Beneath was found a white marble sarcophagus between seven and eight feet long, three feet broad and three feet deep, composed of several pieces joined by mortar; the body, placed therein on its back, was swathed and embalmed. Below this, divided from it by a partition about nine inches thick, was discovered another coffin of the same size and with similar contents. On the inside of the lid of the latter was found an inscription, whose date corresponds with A.D. 369. Other coffins again were discovered below this, but the excavations were not thoroughly carried out. The stone, as frequently happens, was broken in pieces and part of it built into a wall. De Rossi describes the whole inscription from Ciampino, and indicates by his plate the small portion still surviving (see his no. 211, p. 108). He also gives (Rom. Sott. t. i. p. 94) a diagram illustrating this mode of sepulture. Coffins thus placed one above another in strata have not, so far as De Rossi is aware, been observed in Africa, or in Upper Italy or in France, or in any other country where subterranean cemeteries were unknown. The arrangement indeed is substantially the same as that which is adopted in the catacombs of Rome [CATACOMBS, in Vol. I. p. 313].

Some very singular tombs have been found in the north of Italy, at Brescia, Verona, and especially at Milan, below the floor of the basilica of Fausta. Contrary to the rule which obtains in the Roman catacombs, the tombs are decorated with paintings in the interior; they are constructed of masonry, and their narrow walls are adorned on the inside with images and symbols traced in colours. They have been assigned to the ages of persecution, but although this opinion can hardly be maintained, their style is in all likelihood a survival from the times when it was dangerous to allow signs of Christianity to be seen outwardly (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. t. i. pp. 100-101, and references).

A few words should be said in conclusion of the two principal forms of the sarcophagus which are found in Italy, and also in other countries: (1) the oblong chest or coffin type, with flat lid; the ends are generally square (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. tom. i. tav. xxx. two examples—one sarcophagus is quite plain; the other slightly ornamented) or more rarely rounded (D'Agincourt, Hist. de l'Art, Sculpture, pl. iv. nos. 2 and 3, both sculptured); (2) the cottage type (a capanna of the Italian antiquaries), with lid like a roof, (Le Blant, Inscr. Christ. Gaule, pl. 78, quite plain); the roof ridge is sometimes truncated to admit of an inscription being placed thereon (Le Blant, u. s. pl. 22, no. 139, nearly plain; D'Agin-court, u. s. pl. iv., sculptured), instead of being written on the end (Le Blant, u. s. pl. 69) or on the side (Büchh, C. I. G. no. 9163, pl. xv.). The base of the triangular end of the lid is sometimes ornamented with acroteria, like a temple. (Büchh, u. s.) The chest and lid may each be of a single stone, or of many; bricks and tiles were also used in the construction of the meaner sort. See various examples of sarcophagi given in SCULPTURE.

FRANCE.—After Italy this is the country which most abounds with Christian sepulchral stones and slabs. But of those which are preserved comparatively few tell their full story. The circumstances under which they were found are frequently unknown. M. Le Blant, partly by his own observations and partly by examinations of books and figures, comes to the conclusion that there were three forms of Christian burial in ancient Gaul accompanied by inscriptions. (1) Isolated tombs; (2) cemeteries, where the tombs were either below the surface of the ground, or resting on the soil; or (3) tombs clustered about sanctuaries of saints, or placed in churches (Manuel, pp. 144, 145). Of each of these one or two examples shall now be adduced. It must be borne in mind that no Christian sepulchral inscription of Gaul whose date is known is earlier than the 4th century.

(1) Isolated Tombs.—An example of this isolation was to be seen in the monument of Adelpius, at Sainte-Croix-du-Mont. The date is A.D. 405. It bears the following inscription:

*Deposito Adelfi . . . | anorem N. III
mensium | et triduo P. C. Dom. ntri | Honori
Argusti | Sex a R w posuit | pater Maurresivs et Vrsa m | ? (mater?).*

It is now in the museum at Bordeaux (Le Blant, Ins. Chr. G. t. ii. p. 384, no. 591).

"Elle (l'inscription) était," says M. Jouannet, "encore en place il y a quelques années au pied des côteaux de Viole dans les vignes du Peyrat, près de la voie publique. Elle était encastrée sur la grande face d'un tombeau construit en moellons à chaux et à sable, et qui renfermait encore un squelette" (quoted by Le Blant, u. s.).

It would appear probable that a considerable number of the smaller extant inscriptions on marble of square or oblong form have been let into the tombs or sarcophagi, or into the wall near them, both in France and in various other countries (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. t. i. pp. 95, 96).

Another and a very curious instance of an isolated tomb occurs near Charnes, which was visited in the 17th century, when Spon saw it, as the burial-place of a saint. The inscription is in elegiacs, and the name of the person buried, Alethius, is read in acrostic. It is singular that it contains no evidence of distinctly Christian feeling. The last line, which is prose, probably indicated the date of the consulate of Paulinus, A.D. 534, when the Franks invaded Burgundy, to which allusion seems to be made in line seven. The lid of the sarcophagus, containing the inscription enclosed in a label of a common form, is figured by Le Blant (u. s. p. 196, pl. 64, no. 391), and he says that the form of the sarcophagus is exactly like one given by

M. de Boissieu (Inscr. Ant. de Lyon, no. cvii. p. 524).

The epitaph runs thus:

*Aevi ingens genes egregium atq ordine princeps
Lugduni procerem nobile consilium
Exacto vitae transcendit ad aethera cursu
Terrenum temulo dans animam speris
[Hic patris] reliqua gener ac pia filia condunt

If the last distich is rightly restored the initial letters C V will probably stand, as M. Léon Renier thinks, for Clarissimus Vir; his proper title seems to be required.

(2) Cemeteries.

(a) Where the earth received the sepultures.

—At St. Gervais a cemetery was discovered not many years ago, in making a cutting for the Vienne railroad. A great part of the inscriptions found therein are supposed by M. Le Blant to belong to the 5th century. Among the sarcophagi some were made out of one block, but the majority were composed of tiles and old fragments; in several instances the tombs had been placed one above another, and some corpses had been deposited between their lateral walls. With the exception of one which faced the south, they were regularly turned towards the east, after the usual Christian manner. Although the cemetery had never been violated, none of the epitaphs were placed symmetrically; they were found as it were thrown hap-hazard (comme jetées par hasard) upon the tombs, or in the inside or near them. A hasty sketch, by M. Girard, shews the irregular disposition of the tombs (Le Blant, u. s. tom. ii. pp. 52–53, with a figure).

Recent excavations in an ancient cemetery of the church of St. Jean-des-Vignes, near Châlons-sur-Saône, have revealed sarcophagi of free-stone (grès) placed one above another two or three deep. They are supposed to be of the Merovingian age (Le Blant, u. s. t. ii. pp. 543–4).

At Lyons, in 1731, in making a trench for laying down pipes, a cemetery was discovered which served at once for Christian and pagan burials. The excavations were not pursued further than was necessary for making the conduit. Of the inscribed stones which turned up by chance the greater number were dated, and among them was found the earliest dated inscription yet discovered in France, being of A.D. 334 (Le Blant, u. s. t. i. p. 139, no. 62; and Manuel, pp. 211, 212).

The inscription was sometimes written in the inside of the sarcophagus, on a slab forming its bottom. Two such were found at Briord, one being made of stones and bricks, the other having its sides and lid composed of tiles and undressed fragments (non-taillés). They are at least as early as the beginning of the sixth century (Le Blant, u. s. t. ii. p. 6, no. 374; also p. 20, no. 381).

(b) Where the Sarcophagi were resting on the Soil.—Such occur at Aliscamps, near Arles, in great numbers. Le Blant (Manuel, p. 145) observes that the mass of tombs here struck the eyes of Dante and Ariosto with amazement. (Inf. ix. 112, 115; Orl. Fur. xxxix. st. 72.)

Le Blant mentions an inscription engraved "sur le versant du couvercle d'un sarcophage de pierre." This cover, in form of a roof, is also marked with a cross pattée rudely traced with the point (u. s. t. ii. p. 271, no. 535). It is undated. Another inscription from the same place belongs to A.D. 541 (Le Blant, u. s. p. 272, no. 537). De Rossi also mentions having seen at Aliscamps coffins of calcareous stone with covers of the same shape incised with the chrisma and various forms of crosses, as well as lead coffins to contain the body (Rom. Sott. t. i. p. 95). When Mr. Fairholt visited Aliscamps in 1856, he remarked that, in spite of the numbers of sarcophagi that have been carried thence, hundreds still remain; and that for nearly a mile, as the visitor walks from Arles to the old church, he passes between rows of Roman tombs lying three and four deep on each side of him. The best tombs have been carried to the museums; a few of those that remain have sculptured inscriptions; some bear the insignia of the profession of the dead which they contained, as where the carpenter's adze and the mason's plumb and line appear; but the larger number have the Christian monogram only. A sketch of the general appearance of a part of the cemetery is given (C. R. Smith's Collect. Ant. vol. v. pp. 43, 44).

At Sivaux coffins or sarcophagi, engraved with a cross or chrisma and bearing a simple name, have been found on an old burying-ground (champ de sépulture). They seem to be of the 6th century, or thereabouts, and among them are some which appear to be pagan (Le Blant, u. s. t. ii. pp. 357-359; nos. 576 A-576 B). Some of the monuments of Aliscamps and of Sivaux have been drawn by Beaumécé, but not very correctly (Le Blant, u. s. t. i. p. 25).

(3) Burials in Churches and Sanctuaries.—From the apse to the middle of the nave of the ancient church of St. Peter of Vienne have been found beneath the surface an important series of Christian tombs, and more recently others reaching down to the threshold between the church and the porch. Towards the altar, where the relics of the martyrs were preserved, they were more numerous, and in the choir were two or three deep; but not so near the entrance. The coffins had been old pagan sarcophagi, or made out of the débris of ancient buildings. The inscriptions, mostly cut in marble, have often been let into the stone which re-covered the tombs (Le Blant, u. s. ii. p. 581; see also De Rossi, Rom. Sott. t. i. p. 95, and the reference). They belong, certainly in part, and probably all, to the 6th century. Among these broken relics was found a piece of the epitaph of Sylvia, wife of the patrician Celsus (A.D. 579), of which a complete copy exists in a MS. of the 9th century (Le Blant, u. s. p. 582, and Manuel, p. 219). A great number of Gaulish inscriptions shew that tombs were placed under the protection of the graves of martyrs (Le Blant, u. s. t. i. p. 397; see also his Manuel, pp. 146-148).

The tomb of Hilary, bishop of Arles, who died in 449, was formerly in a subterranean chapel of the church of St. Honoratus at that place. It is a sarcophagus of white marble, and the inscription is written on the triangular end of the lid. It is now preserved in the museum. It reads: Sacro | sanctae le | gis antestis | (followed by a leaf) Hilarivs (between two doves) hic quiescit (preceded by chrisma, followed by vase) | (Le Blant, u. s. t. ii. p. 252, no. 515, pl. 69, no. 416). De Rossi remarks on the beauty of the marble sarcophagi with Christian sculptures, representing scenes of the Old and New Testaments, which are to be seen at Marseilles, Arles, Nîmes, Avignon, and other cities in the south of France (u. s. p. 95).

Zacharias, third bishop of Lyons, in the beginning of the 3rd century, laid the first foundation of a cella known as the church of the Maccabees, and in after-times as the church of St. Justus. It was originally underground, being a kind of crypt which was carefully concealed from the knowledge of the pagans; therein were deposited the remains of the illustrious martyrs of Lyons, with St. Irenaeus at their head. In the ruins of this church were found in the year 1736 several Christian sepulchral slabs of marble belonging in part or entirely to the 5th century (Le Blant, u. s. t. i. pp. 39 sqq.). The two following are among the most important:—

(1) Flavivs Flori [urs] | ex tribenis gri vixit | octoginta et | septim militavi (sic) ann. | triginta et novem positv (sic) | est ad sanctos et pro | batvs amorum deivm | et octo hic conmemo | ra [tio fit] scilicet in ecclesia Lugdunensi a | id Calendas Aug. (Le Blant, no. 41).

Date probably of the 5th century, the a id (ante diem primum) for pridie being a formula of that age. (See Le Blant, u. s. p. 338.)

To Florinus, a tribune, buried beside the tombs of the saints or martyrs of Lyons; entered as a military probationer, when eighteen years of age; mentioned during divine service in the diptychs, or list of benefactors to the church.

This inscription is interesting as mentioning the military profession of a Christian. Others have been diligently collected by Le Blant (u. s.).

(2) In hec loco (for hunc locum) requievit Leucadia | deo sacrata pella qui (sic) vitam | suam proit proposuerat | jessit qui vixit annos xvi tantem | beatior in dno concedit mentem | pst consv Theodosi xiii. The chrisma between two doves facing each other (Le Blant, no. 44).

Post consulatum Theodosii xiii. gives A.D. 430 for the date.

The qui twice occurring as feminine marks the transition to the French qui.

Le Blant's remarks on the three forms of Christian burial in France apply to sepulchres in France of an earlier date than the 8th century.

There is however another class of tombstones which he does not notice, belonging, in part at least, to a somewhat later time, but not altogether too late to be noticed in the present work. Le Men (in Revue Arch. vol. xxix. p. 89, for 1875) observes that at an ancient period, about the 8th, 9th, or 10th century, it was customary in Lower Brittany to mark the graves of important persons by a long stone set in the ground, having the form of a pyramid or truncated cone, often channelled from top to bottom, sometimes surmounted by a cross of stone, and frequently having a cross pattée incised on one face.^k They rarely bore any inscription, but some few record the names of the deceased. They are very numerous in the departments of Morbihan and Finisterre. Messrs. Haddan and Stubbs (Councils, vol. ii. pp. 97, 98) give an account of some of these tombstones and inscriptions, one or two of which appear to be even as early as the 6th century; but they observe that they all "need sifting and careful examination to ascertain their real dates."

SPAIN.—A very large proportion of the sepulchral inscriptions now remaining have been removed from their original sites, and the circumstances under which they were found have not been recorded. It is probable, however, that the modes of interment which prevailed throughout the country were much the same as in France. All the three kinds mentioned by Le Blant occur here also. Thus, an isolated tomb of one Oppilianus was found in 1821 in an olive-yard in Villafranca de Cordoba. It was a sarcophagus constructed of stones, covered with a large marble slab, bearing an inscription in twelve lines, dated by the Spanish era 680, i.e. A.D. 642 (Hübner, Inscr. Christ. Hisp. p. 36, no. 123). A Christian cemetery was discovered near Asquerosa, about half a league from Pinos de la Puente (Ilurco). Full particulars of an inscribed slab brought thence, probably of the 5th or 6th century, are to be found in Hübner (u. s. no. 116). We have an example of a tomb placed in a sanctuary at Alcalá del Río (Ilipa), where there is an ornamental cippus erected in honour of bishop Gregory, A.D. 544. At the top is the chrisma, combined with the α and ω , enclosed in a circle. On either side are two quatrefoils, one above another. The inscription, which commences with the words "In hoc tymvlo iacet," shews that the cippus was once placed in immediate connexion with the grave. It is now standing in the chapel, dedicated in the 15th century by king Ferdinand to this Gregory, which was probably erected on the same site as a more ancient chapel (Hübner, u. s. no. 60). Fine sarcophagi, sculptured with scriptural subjects, probably of the 5th or 6th century, have been found in the crypt of a ruined church at Saragossa (Hübner, u. s. no. 152).

GERMANY.—For the few notices of tombs which follow, we are indebted mostly to De Rossi. At Augsburg there is a sepulchral area or "hortus, quem dudum Afra comparaverat et in quo mausoleum sibi suisque esse decreverat," as a writer of the 15th century expresses it, perhaps following some more ancient authority. She lies buried in a sarcophagus of calcareous stone similar to those of Aliscamps. At the beginning of the present century her coffin was found to contain a plate of lead inscribed AFRA in good Roman uncial characters, but without any indication of Christianity. She and her companions suffered in the Diocletian persecution, according to Ruinart on August 7, A.D. 304. There are also sarcophagi of the same kind without any inscription whatever at Cologne, in the crypt of St. Gereon and in the basilica of St. Ursula. At Trier likewise were found in the basilicas of SS. Paulinus and Matthias a large number of sarcophagi similar to those of Vienne, mentioned above (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. t. i. pp. 87, 95, 98, and the references). At the same place, as Le Blant observes, occurred a cemetery in which Christian and pagan tombs were mixed: on one of the former an inscribed tablet of white marble was let into a thick stone slab, which was placed against the side of the lid; this tomb was made in the form of a roof turned upside down (u. s. t. i. p. 380).

The ancient Franks, and perhaps the Germanic tribes generally, buried the dead in a wooden coffin (the noffus of their ancient laws, see Ducange, s. v.) or in a stone chest (petra), placing thereover small wooden structures covered with drapery (the aristato or stapum of the same laws, see Ducange, s. v.). The Christians adopted this usage; we read of corpses "pallis ac naufis exornata" (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Conf. c. 20); and from it our modern pall seems to have descended. Sometimes the structures of wood were larger (porticulus, atriolum, or basilica), and were of an oblong form, having four columns and being open on all sides; these also were used by the Christians. Wendelin in his Salic Glossary observes that up to the year 1000 almost all basilicas in Burgundy were made of wood (see Chifflet, Anast. Child. Regis, pp. 78–80).

GREAT BRITAIN.—In the Celtic parts—that is to say, in Cornwall, Devonshire, Wales, and Scottish and English Cumbria—pillar-stones, generally very rudely formed, were erected over the graves of the deceased. They vary in height from about two feet and a half to twelve feet, the most usual height being about four or five feet or a little more; they are four-sided, for the most part of nearly the same breadth throughout their whole length, usually rounded at the top, but occasionally sloping from the base to a point or cut square (Hübner, Inscr. Brit. Christ. nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 10, 15, 18, 19, 30, 71, &c.; Berlin, 1876).¹ A great many of these bear no signs of Christianity, though they are presumed to be Christian by Hübner and others; but upon some few of them such signs are manifest in the chrisma (the only symbol save the cross which occurs), or in words, as Christianus, in pace, &c. It is exceedingly difficult to assign most of them to any particular period; some however are regarded as probably belonging to the 5th, while others are referred to various succeeding centuries. The inscriptions are mostly very short, often giving the name only, or "Here lies (hic jacet, more commonly ic jacit) such an one." In some cases the corpse was certainly buried under a heap of stones and the pillar placed at the top (Hübner, u. s. no. 136); such monuments were probably solitary. More usually the burials were in churchyards, or in cemeteries attached to religious houses, many pillar-stones having been found in such places or built into the walls of churches and priories (Hübner, u. s. passim). These rude cippi are often found not in situ, some having been converted into gateposts (Hübner, u. s. nos. 14, 21, 102, 148), or used for stiles, or bridges, or door-sills (Hübner, u. s. nos. 17, 29, 101).

^k Christian symbols occur on a "menhir" near Lannion, in the department of Côtes du Nord. See Haddan and Stubbs, vol. ii. p. 98, note.

The number of Cornish pillar-stones bearing inscriptions falling within our period, whose Christianity can be counted upon, is extremely small. (See Hübner, u. s. nos. 1-22; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, vol. i. pp. 162 and 163.) In Devonshire there are no stones indubitably Christian bearing inscriptions; but stone crosses not inscribed, which are considered to be Christian, occur in several places here and in Cornwall.

In Wales, pillar-stones with Christian inscriptions are much more numerous. On one of them Paulinus is commemorated in two barbarous hexameters; he is presumed to be the bishop of that name who lived about the middle of the 6th century, and who taught St. David and St. Tilo at his college of Whitland. Another mentions Idnert, who is supposed to be the same as the last bishop of Llanbadarn in the first part of the 8th century (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, vol. i. pp. 164-169, 625).

In Scottish and English Cumbria there are very few inscribed tombstones whose Christianity is certain, but uninscribed crosses, some ornamented, have been found in churchyards in Cumberland, in Wigtonshire, and about Glasgow.

At Kirkmadrine in Wigtonshire, however, there was in the old churchyard a stone bearing the chrisma on the upper part of both back and front. On the front the A ET ω is placed above the chrisma, which is enclosed in a circle, and below it, "Here lie the holy and principal priests, i.e. Viventius and Majorius." It is probable that it is of the 5th century, and commemorates priests connected with St. Ninian. This stone, and another bearing the chrisma and the name of Florentius, were lately used as gate-posts in the wall of the burying-ground (Hübner, u. s. nos. 205, 206; Haddan and Stubbs, u. s. vol. ii. pp. 51, 52).

The Bewcastle Cross. (Stephens.)

There are very few pillar-shaped monuments inscribed in the Anglo-Saxon language; one, apparently sepulchral, has been found near Camelford in Cornwall, but the meaning of the inscription has not been ascertained (Hübner, u. s. no. 16). The Saxon tombstones are principally of two kinds—stone crosses with long stem and short arms near the top, sometimes highly ornamented with interlacing patterns, &c., inscribed with Runes; or slabs bearing incised crosses very similar in style to the Irish (see below), and with Latin or Runic characters. Splendid Runic crosses have been erected to more than one of our early kings: one, now mutilated, to Oswin king of Deira, about A.D. 651, now reads only "After (to) Onswini, King;" it is at Collingham, Yorkshire. Another, at Bewcastle, Cumberland, was erected to king Alcfrith about A.D. 670. The top and both arms of the cross have been broken off; its present height is fourteen feet and a half, and it is conjectured to have been originally more than twenty feet high. Upon it are figures of John the Baptist with lamb, of the Saviour, and of another holding a bird (hawk?). On three of the four sides are vine-branches and grapes; two of these have also Runic inscriptions, as has also the fourth, where the figures are seen in relief. The longest inscription on this side tells us that this beacon (pillar) was erected by three persons named "after (to) Alcfrith, some time king and son of Oswy." The last sentence, to which a cross is prefixed, is "Pray for his soul's great sin." A third, the latest belonging to our period, is to Eadulf (A.D. 705), of which a small fragment only remains. It appears to read: "This is King Eadulf's grave; pray for his soul. Myredah made me, Hludbryg inscribed me" (see Stephens' Runic Monuments, pp. 390, 398, 461). A more humble, but better preserved cross than any of the foregoing, was found at Lancaster in a churchyard by some men who were digging a grave. Its date is supposed to lie between 600 and 700, and it reads in Runes: "Pray for Cynibalth; God bless him." A fragment of another cross, about A.D. 700, to Hroetberht, found at Falstone, Northumberland, has a Saxon inscription written twice, in Runic and also in Roman characters; and a small piece of a cross found at Dewsbury in Yorkshire bears a Saxon inscription, written in Roman characters; it probably belongs to the 7th or 8th century. (See fig. p. 1987.) Both inscriptions request prayers for the soul of the dead (Stephens, u. s. pp. 375, 456, 464).

Sarcophagi were not unknown to the Anglo-Saxons;^m one of the capanna type, bearing a Greek cross on the side of one end, was found at Dewsbury (Fosbroke, Encycl. of Ant. vol. i. p. 132, with fig. from Gent. Mag. 1836, ii. p. 38). The lid of another, rounded at both ends, and bearing a peculiarly formed cross, on which is inscribed in Runes, Kitil Urna lieth here, was discovered at Dover (Stephens, u. s. p. 465).

At Hartlepool, in Durham, was found in July, 1833, the cemetery which belonged to the ancient church of St. Hilda. Several small slabs (cent. 7?), some with Runes and some with Latin inscriptions, were dug up about one hundred and thirty yards distant from the church. They bore crosses, with or without A and ω , and either the name of the dead only, or with the addition of a request for prayer on his behalf. Some are said to have been found three feet and a half below the surface of the soil, each like a pillow under the head of a skeleton placed north and south. The largest of these was only a foot square, the smallest seven and a half by five and a half inches. Bede (Lib. iv. c. 11) mentions that the Saxons sometimes buried the dead in stone coffins, and may perhaps allude to a pillow-stone in his account of the burial of Sebbi, king of the East Saxons (Stephens, u. s. pp. 392-397). It is strange, if true, that stones inscribed "Pray for such a one," should be originally placed underground.ⁿ

Saxon tombstones with Latin inscriptions have occurred in various parts of England, mostly in Yorkshire. On two fragments, perhaps pieces of a cross, we have the name of Aedilburga, abbess of Hackness; on both pieces prayers are invoked for her repose. They are of the beginning of the 8th century (Hübner, u. s. nos. 182, 183). For the remaining tombstones it must be sufficient to refer to Hübner (pp. 61-73).

IRELAND.—A small number of four-sided pillars have been found in ancient Irish cemeteries, which are of the same general character as those of Wales and other parts of Great Britain. Most of these have been found in the county of Kerry; they bear incised crosses, which are sometimes accompanied by the letters DNS, DNI, DNO, for Dominus, Domini, Domino.^o Dr. Petrie considered that they were "unquestionably of the 5th, or, at the latest, of the 6th century" (Stokes, Irish Christ. Inscr. vol. ii. p. 6). Other square pillars, bearing crosses of various forms, have been found at Killpeacan (now Puckawn), in the county of Tipperary, standing close together near the ruins of an old church.^p These last bear every appearance of being sepulchral. Some of those of Kerry, in Miss Stokes's opinion, viz. those bearing letters as above, do not appear to have been sepulchral, but were rather signs set up as terminal crosses to mark the boundaries of the sanctuary (u. s. vol. ii. p. 133). There is a fine quadrangular pillar-stone at Killnasaggart in the county of Armagh, which certainly seems, from the inscription, to have been erected for the latter purpose (cf. the Whithorn Inscription, Hübner, u. s. no. 297).

By much the greater number of sepulchral monuments consist of flat slabs, which have been sometimes found in situ. The earliest which can be approximately dated are of the 7th century, and there are others of the 8th and of the 9th. There is little doubt that they were ⁿ May not these little slabs have originally been set in sarcophagi above ground, or in the walls or floor of the monastery? Similar small slabs have been found in the catacombs of Rome (Stephens, u. s. p. 394, from Burgon).

^o The letters DNS are inscribed on one side of an ornamented cross in the churchyard at Nevern in Pembrokeshire; it is supposed to be of the 8th century. The letters on the other side, AXHEH (?), have not been explained (Hübner, u. s. no. 103).

^p At Killeen Cornac, in the county of Kildare, there is a cemetery about the ruins of a very ancient church which was on the summit of a mound. "Pillar stones," says Dr. S. Fergusson, "fragments of crosses, and the debris of the walls, which formerly supported the terraces, give an appearance of singularity and antiquity to the place which it is difficult to describe." A sketch accompanies this notice in Stokes, u. s. vol. ii. p. 2, but it does not clearly appear whether the pillar-stones bear crosses or not; one of them has an Ogham inscription, with no certain mark of Christianity.

always laid flat upon the surface of the soil, or in the floor of a church or other sacred building over the body of the deceased. The brief request which most of them contain to pray for the deceased seems to shew that they could not have been buried along with the corpse, but must have been visible to the eye. The greater part of them have been broken, so that it is impossible to ascertain the dimensions accurately. A few are nearly perfect, and their dimensions are approximately as follows:—27 inches by 20 (vol. i. pl. xviii. fig. 47); 32 inches by 18 (pl. xix. fig. 49); 40 inches by 20 (pl. xliii. fig. 108); 58 inches by 20 (vol. ii. pl. xv. fig. 30); 33 inches by 12 (pl. xvi. fig. 34). The great ancient cemetery of Ireland was at Clonmacnois, or Cluain, in King's County, and princes and nobles desired to be buried there for the sake of the intercession of the patron saint Ciaran, who built the monastery at that place about the year 544. An ancient Irish poem speaks of men "sleeping under the flags of Cluain." Many of these flags of fine work have been met with in digging graves and during recent excavations (Stokes, u. s. vol. i. pp. 4, 5). Another singularly beautiful stone, probably of about the 9th century, the time "when Irish art was at the highest point, still lies half-buried in grass in the churchyard of Durrow" in the same county (Stokes, u. s. vol. ii. p. 57). At Termonfechin, near Drogheda, in the county of Louth, a native stone was found in the clay floor of the church when it was excavated about ten years ago. It bears a Greek cross, and a very early Celtic inscription, entreating prayers for two persons named, "who made the stone fort" (Stokes, u. s. vol. ii. p. 70). Some sepulchral stones were discovered in a church of the 12th century at Mona-incha in the county of Tipperary, which appear to be greatly older than the building itself, and may have been laid on the floor of an earlier structure on the site (Stokes, u. s. vol. ii. pp. 35-37). Miss Stokes remarks that "while the standing crosses" (none earlier than the 10th century, as it would appear) "throughout Ireland are much alike, there is a marked dissimilarity in the sepulchral slabs found in the different ancient burial-grounds throughout the country" (Stokes, u. s. vol. i. p. 8). These were, in perhaps every instance, marked with a cross of some kind. Sometimes a simple Greek cross precedes a proper name, as that of Colman at Clonmacnois, who died A.D. 661. The Ogham following the name answers to the Irish word bocht, i.e. poor (Stokes, u. s. vol. i. p. 16). Sometimes an ornamented Greek cross has a circle about the centre, and each arm is terminated by a semicircle, as that of Colomban, who died A.D. 628 (Stokes, u. s. vol. i. pp. 15, 16 pl. i. fig. 3; see also Vol. I. p. 847). But the peculiarly Irish form is the Latin cross having a circle about the centre, of which the earliest perfect example is seen on the slab of Cuindless at Clonmacnois; he died A.D. 724 (Stokes, u. s. vol. i. p. 18). Crosses, both Greek and Latin, are sometimes enclosed in parallelograms. For the various details of ornamentation, see Stokes, u. s. vol. ii. pp. 138-146.

Tombstone reading "Colman the Poor." (Stokes.)

Respecting the tombs of other countries, a very few words must suffice. In most of them they appear to be of much the same general character as those which have been already mentioned. There are cippi in Egypt (Boeckh, no. 9131), in Asia Minor (id. no. 9165), as well as in Greece and the adjacent islands (id. no. 9311 sqq. nos. 9292, 9299). Sarcophagi appear to have been general throughout Asia Minor (id. nos. 9206, 9264, 9283), and have been found in considerable numbers in the cemeteries of Corycus in Cilicia (id. no. 9163, with fig., sqq.). They occur also in Africa, one sculptured with the Good Shepherd between sheep, Renier, Inscr. Rom. de l'Algérie, nos. 2293, 4031).

It is curious to observe that the columns of the peristyle of the Parthenon have been converted, so to say, into Christian tombstones. Upon them are inscribed in situ a great number of Christian epitaphs, the earliest of which appear to be of the 7th and 8th centuries, while they go down as low as the 14th (id. nos. 9350-9421). Their genuineness, however, has been denied (Ritter, de Comp. Tit. Christ. p. 2).

Cemeteries were attached to churches or monasteries in Nubia (id. no. 9122) and in Asia Minor (id. nos. 9249, 9268). Burials in churches perhaps occurred at Constantinople and in Thessaly (id. 9447, 9424), but appear to have been rare throughout the East generally, at all events in early times.

Tombs excavated in rocks occur at Jerusalem and elsewhere. On the side of the mountain called the Hill of Offence facing Mount Zion, a series of subterranean chambers have been cut out, each containing one or more repositories for the dead, carved in the rock of the sides of those chambers. M. Clermont Ganneau has lately discovered here several small sarcophagi, or rather ossuary chests, some bearing Hebrew and some Greek inscriptions, in which the name of the deceased is accompanied by a cross; these, he thinks, are almost coeval with Christianity in Palestine (De Rossi, Bull. 1874, pp. 155-158; Quart. Statem. Pal. Expl. Fund. 1874). Over the entrance of some of the sepulchres are Greek inscriptions, to which crosses are usually prefixed. One of them is over the door of the chamber appropriated to Jeremiah, a monk of the monastery of St. Thecla (id. no. 9139). These tombs are without ornament, and are supposed to be earlier than some other sepulchres at no great distance from them at Acldama. In some of these last, which may probably be of about the 4th or 5th century, are ancient paintings upon the sides and roof of the chambers, representing the apostles and others with nimbi about their heads (Clarke's Travels, vol. ii. pp. 549-571; Boeckh, u. s. pp. 441-443). Sepulchral caves occur also in North Syria (Boeckh, u. s. no. 9152), in various parts of Asia Minor (id. nos. 9211, 9259), and in Malta (no. 9450).*

We have said nothing of certain architectural monuments of a sepulchral character erected in memory of Christian princes, such as the tomb of the empress Helena outside Rome, the mausoleum at Rome of Constantia, a daughter of the emperor Constantine, both circular buildings with domes; of the cruciform funeral chapel of Galla Placidia at Ravenna, or of the splendid mausoleum of Theodoric the Great at the same place: for these see CHAPEL, CHURCH, also the well-known works of Hübsch, Quast and Fergusson, where figures will be found. The ruins of a very few others still survive. One known as the mausoleum of St. Soteris, of circular form and of gigantic size, stands beside the Appian Way, not far from the above-ground cemetery of St. Callistus (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. tom. i. tav. 1; tom. iii. p. 465). Another, which De Rossi considers to belong to the martyr Tibertius and other companions of St. Cecilia, is to be seen above the cemetery of Praetextatus; it is of hexagonal form and having six apses (De Rossi, u. s. p. 471). He points out that a martyrium described by St. Gregory Nyssen was of octagonal form surmounted by a dome (u. s. pp. 459-472). It can hardly be doubted that many more Christian sepulchral monuments of an architectural character have perished. There are several imperial laws of the 4th and 5th centuries (for which see Bingham, xiii. c. 4) directed against the violation of tombs in general; one of Constans condemns the abstraction of columns and marbles, and another of Constantius the transferring of the materials of sepulchral buildings to private houses. These laws were issued to protect such sepulchres without religious distinction, and rich Christians spared no expense in the erection of these edifices; see the passage from St. Basil quoted above.

B. Objects found in Tombs.

The Christians, in common with their heathen neighbours, were in the habit of placing a variety of objects in the tombs of their departed friends. A Christian motive is sometimes evident in their selection, although for the most part it has not been influenced by any such consideration. Many of them have been already incidentally mentioned [OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD, p. 1433]; a variety of personal ornaments and articles of the toilet are amongst the objects most commonly found. The waste to which the custom of thus placing gold and silver ornaments led became indeed everywhere so excessive that an imperial edict, though not always enforced, was issued to check the custom. [BURIAL OF THE DEAD, Vol. I. p. 253.] The most remarkable example is the large marble coffin of the child Maria, who had been affianced to the emperor Honorius, which was placed in the Basilica of St. Peter of Rome; it was found, when it was opened in 1544, to contain an immense quantity of jewellery among many other things, as will be seen by the following epitome of its contents: a vest, cloak, &c., made of silk and cloth of gold, from which forty pounds of gold were extracted by melting; a large silver box containing many vases and articles in crystal, great and small, one in the shape of a nautilus fitted up with gold settings for a lamp; other vases and little animals in agate and in gold, little vessels of gold, a gold heart, gold buckles adorned with gems, rings and hoops of gold of various patterns, gold pendants, and perhaps the remains of a rattle (crepundia), crosses made of red and green gems, crosses of gold set with gems, earrings of precious stones, necklaces of gold and gems, gold bracelets, a gold pin bearing the names of Maria and Honorius, a silver pin and many fragments of precious stones, besides other articles. (Chiflet, Anast. Child. Regis, pp. 55, 56, quoting Surius; King, Gnostics, pp. 123-125, quoting Fanno; De Rossi, Bull. 1863, pp. 53 sqq.) With this may be compared the objects found in 1653 in the tomb of the pagan king Childeric at Tournai, enumerated by Chiflet (u. s. pp. 37-39, 188, 189). For the splendid contents of the Christian tombs of Helena, mother of Constantine, of Narses, duke of Italy (who died 568), of Clovis, and of Charlemagne, see Chiflet, u. s. pp. 59, 60, 91, and compare Archæologia, vol. iii. pp. 389-90. So far as the Roman catacombs are concerned, these objects are enumerated under CATACOMBS, Vol. I. p. 314. See also Martigny, Dict. Ant. Chrét. under "Objets trouvés dans les Tombeaux Chrétiens," and De Rossi's Rom. Sott. t. iii. p. 305, for impressions of others remaining in the exterior mortar of the loculi. They have also been found, though not in equal numbers in other countries, particularly in Gaul (Cochet, La Normandie Souterraine, passim and plates). Some of these occasionally bear Christian devices, more especially rings (see RINGS; GEMS). Fibulae have also occurred in tombs of the Merovingian age, on which Daniel is seen between two lions: in one instance his name is added (Le Blant, u. s., pl. 42, 87). The abbé Greppo possessed a silver hair-pin of six faces above, on the first of which was written ROMVLA (the name of the owner), on the third VIVAS IN DEO, on the fifth SEMPER; it was probably found in the catacombs of Rome (Perret, Catac. vol. iv. pl. 20, no. 5, and vol. vi. p. 120; Martigny, u. s.). A pendant, composed of two onyx-stones joined together by a circle of gold ornamented on the edge with four emeralds and ten rubies, was discovered in the tomb of Maria. On one face was inscribed HONORI | MARIA | STILICHO | SERENA | VIVATIS, on the other STILICHO | SERENA | THERMANTIA | EUCHERI | VIVATIS |, with the chrisma (P)

* De Rossi mentions that pictures like those in the catacombs of Rome are to be seen in a Christian cavern in the Cyrenaica, and that a similarly painted vault occurs in a chamber excavated in a rock in the Crimea (Rom. Sott. vol. i. p. 100). Probably these were sepulchral.

in the centre of each side (Perret, u. s. pl. 16, no. 78). The comb of St. Lupus (died 623), preserved in the treasury of the cathedral of Sens, was probably placed in his tomb with a religious feeling, as priests were accustomed to comb their hair before celebrating the Eucharist (Martigny, u. s.; Ducange, s. v. Pecten).

Vestments are also frequently found in tombs: for Maria see above; for Constantine, who was placed in a gold coffin, clothed in the imperial purple and having a diadem on his head, see Eus. Vit. Const. lib. iv. c. 66; and for Charlemagne, who was dressed in his imperial robes, see Archæologia, u. s. Military men were buried in military garments: St. Gereon was clothed in a soldier's purple cloak and black leather belt (Chiflet, u. s. pp. 95, 197). See more on this subject generally under OBSEQUIES OF THE DEAD, § v. p. 1428.

The insignia of office of those interred therein have often been found in tombs. Sebert, king of the East Angles, was buried with his royal robes and thumb-ring set with a ruby; while Charlemagne had his sword girt at his side, and opposite to him were suspended his golden sceptre and golden shield, which had been consecrated by pope Leo III. (Archæologia, u. s.). Ecclesiastics were also sometimes buried with the symbols of their office. In the last century the tomb at Clonmacnois of St. Ciaran (died A.D. 544) was opened, and amongst other things his chalice and crozier were found therein (Stokes, Irish Christ. Inscr. vol. i. pp. 1, 3). A pectoral cross of lead and a small chalice were found among other objects in the grave of Birinus, bishop of Dorchester, who died A.D. 650 (Surius, de Vit. Sanct. Dec. 3, vol. vi. p. 220, Ven. 1681). And when the tomb of St. Cuthbert, who died 687, was opened in the 12th century, an onyx chalice was discovered beside his body [CHALICE]. To descend to people of lower rank, implements of handicraft, some of which have been mistaken for instruments of torture, have been found in the loculi of the catacombs [CATACOMBS, Vol. I. p. 314].

Lamps, pottery, and glass of various kinds have occurred both in the inside and outside of tombs in many parts of the Christian world [CATACOMBS, u. s.; LAMPS, POTTERY, GLASS]. Bay leaves have also been found under the head of the corpse or elsewhere in the coffin; they were placed there in token of triumph over death (Martigny, u. s.).

The instruments by which their sufferings were inflicted were sometimes placed within the tombs of martyrs [see OBSEQUIES, p. 1434]. Martigny has collected references to other instances. Leadern rolls containing the acts of their passion have also been found buried with martyrs (Boldetti, Cimit. pp. 322-324, and tav. ii. no. 3).

Perhaps the only other objects discovered in tombs which need be mentioned here are coins and medals. The first Christians, says Bosio, when they buried martyrs, were accustomed to bury with them the coins of the emperor under whom they suffered (Rom. Subt. lib. iv. c. 31). This may explain the finding of coins of Diocletian in the tomb of Caius, bishop of Rome (A.D. 283-296. Boldetti, Cimit. pp. 102-3). But in a single tomb of the cemetery of St. Agnes, Buonarrotti counted more than ten coins of different emperors of different times (Buon. Vetri orn. di Fig. Pref. p. xi.). Roman money of various periods has also been found in the Christian tombs of Gaul and Germany (Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule, t. i. pp. 210, 345; Boldetti, Cimit. p. 644).

Coins and medals have likewise been seen fixed on the outside of tombs in the catacombs, perhaps for the sake of recognition only (Buon. Osservaz. sopra alc. Medagl. referred to by Martigny, u. s. among other authorities). Their impressions have sometimes remained on the mortar, clearly shewing the types, after the coins have vanished (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. t. iii. pp. 305, 309).

C. Select Sepulchral Inscriptions.

(See also CATACOMBS, Vol. I. pp. 303-4-7-8-11.)

The small collection here given has immediate reference to the article on INSCRIPTIONS (Vol. I. pp. 841-862). Those which are there figured (pp. 846, 847) will all be found written out and in some cases translated below. They were selected mostly with a view to illustrate the different styles of palæography and the different symbols exhibited in different epitaphs. They likewise serve to illustrate the general subject of the present article, which contains a few additional figures; one having symbols not mentioned or represented above (pp. 847, 848). The following selection and the examples already cited in this article have been chosen to illustrate, so far as could be done by a limited number, the various points of interest which epitaphs present, such as their different ages, styles, grammatical peculiarities, contractions of words and modes of dating, as well as for their intrinsic historical, ecclesiastical, or doctrinal importance. Thus the three earliest known dated inscriptions, all in Rome, are here given, as well as the earliest of those in our own country, which belong to the latter part of the period comprised in this work. Examples of the varied forms of composition will here be found, including the most ancient, which have much in common with pagan epitaphs, and those of several definite Christian types which differ in different countries. A few instances of the solecisms, incorrect spellings, and peculiar uses of words as well as of the contractions of words (see INSCRIPTIONS, §§ v. vii.), occur in the epitaphs now given at length. The different modes of dating by consulates, post-consulates, indictions, eras of provinces, reigns of kings, or cyclic periods of time, will also here be exemplified (see u. s. § vi.).

ELATVS EST VIII IDVS AVG. [CONS . . .]

AVG

The great interest attaching to the fragment is the occurrence of D. M. (for Dis Manibus) on a Christian inscription. A few other examples of the same kind are found; nearly all, like the present, supposed to be earlier than the 4th century. (See Vol. I. p. 851; McCaul, u. s. p. 60; Martigny, Dict. s. v. D. M.) It has been variously explained; either as being engraved by stonemasons on the blank stones in advance before they were sold for actual use, or as repeated by Christians by the force of pagan example and habit without definite meaning attached, or as implying a certain fusion of heathenism with Christianity. Such a fusion in respect of this very matter appears in a Christian epitaph (quoted by McCaul, u. s. p. 63), sanctique tui manes petentibus adsint. In one example the chrisma is on either side of D. M. (De Rossi, Bull. 1873, tav. xi.) Deo reddidit spiritum sanctum is an expression found only on Christian monuments. Elatus est is very rarely met with except in pagan epitaphs. The date, now lost, is from the consulate of some emperor.

6. (De Rossi, u. s. no. 48. Engraved in Vol. I. p. 847.) From the cemetery of Callistus and Praetextatus, Rome. A marble tablet, which had once been the side of a sarcophagus; the original inscription having been obliterated:—

Eq(uitius) Heraclius, qui fuit in saeculum (saeculo) an(nos) .xix, m(enses) vii, d(ies) xx, lector r(egionis) sec(undae). Fecerunt(t) (sc. parentes) sibi et filio suo benemerenti in p(ace). Decesit (sic) vii Idus (Idus) Februarius, Urso et Polemio cons(ulibus) (i.e. Feb. 7, A.D. 338).

Rome was divided into seven ecclesiastical districts or regions, and Heraclius was attached as a reader to the second of these.

This inscription shews examples of the various leaves, points, and marks which are frequent in Christian inscriptions, besides the symbols of the chrisma (of unusual form), the dove, and palm-branches.

7. (De Rossi, u. s. no. 55. Engraved in Vol. I. p. 846.) From the cemetery of Theodora.

Constantio Aug. II. et Constanti Aug. [Conss] Nonis Decemb. Claudianus dormit in [pace] (i.e. Dec. 5, A.D. 339).

Principally remarkable as a piece of rude and hasty palaeography on mortar.

8. (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1863, p. 17. Engraved in Vol. I. p. 847.) Discovered in front of the square crypt in the cemetery of Praetextatus, Rome.

Beatissimo Martyri Januario Damasus Episcopus fecit.

Date of inscription determined by the pontificate of Damasus (A.D. 366–384). (Januarius was martyred in 305.)

From a few fragments De Rossi happily restores this inscription, which is written in the beautiful Damasine character.

later period by Pope Symmachus or Vigilius, or John III. (A.D. 498–573), found in the cemetery of St. Callistus.

The restored inscription itself, beautifully written in vermillion, required the restoring hand of De Rossi, who has pieced all the fragments together, and has thus obtained the whole epitaph, with scarcely the loss of a single letter. In addition to this, nine morsels of the original inscription written in the splendid calligraphy of Damasus, or rather of his artist Philocalus, were obtained, and their places were of course at once determined from the restored inscription (De Rossi, u. s. t. iii.). This was one of those epitaphs which was known in MSS. from the transcripts of Alcuin's scholars.

The restored inscription is bounded on all

Fragments of original Damasine Inscription to Eusebius. (De Rossi.)

The same Inscription restored. (De Rossi.)

9. (De Rossi, Roma Sott. vol. ii. p. 191 sqq. tav. iii. iv.; Brownlow and Northcote, Rom. Sott. p. 170, pl. ii. iii.)
Epitaph of St. Eusebius, bishop of Rome (A.D. 310), composed by Damasus, but restored at some sides by two others, in the second of which the letters are placed columnwise below each other. Above and below we have :—

+ Damasus episcopus fecit | Eusebio episcopo et martyri.

Ferius Dionysius Filocalus scripsit (scripsit) | Damasius pappae celtor atque amator (amator).

For Damasius pappae De Rossi suggests Damasi sui papae, a phrase confirmed by other authorities (u. s. p. 200).

The text of the restored inscription, a little corrupt, runs thus when corrected; the errors are given below: the letters in brackets are omitted on the stone.

"Heraclius vetvit lapsos^a peccata dolere,
Eusebivs miseros docuit sua^b crimina flere;
Scinditvr [in]^c partes popvlvs gliscente fvrre,
Seditio, caedes,^d bellvm, discordia, lites.
Exemplo pariter pvlsi feritate tyranni,
Integra cvm rector servaret foedera pacis.
Pertvlt exilivm [d]omino^e sub iudice laetvs;
Litore T[r]inaerio^f mvndvm vitamq. reliqvlt."

(a) lapsos. (b) sum. (c) in, omitted here, occurs in the Damasine fragments. (d) caede only now visible, possibly originally caedē. (e) d may have been obliterated. (f) Tinacrio.

The whole may be expressed in English as follows:

"Damasus, Bishop, set up this to Eusebius, Bishop and Martyr."

"Furius Dionysius Filocalus, a worshipper and lover of Pope Damasus, wrote this."

"Heraclius forbade the lapsed to grieve for their sins. Eusebius taught those unhappy ones to weep for their crimes. The people were rent into parties, and with increasing fury began sedition, slaughter, fighting, discord, and strife. Straightway both [the pope and the heretic] were banished by the cruelty of the tyrant, although the pope was preserving the bonds of peace inviolate. He bore his exile with joy, looking to the Lord as his judge, and on the shore of Sicily gave up the world and his life."

The inscription (translated as above by Messrs. Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 170) refers to the severity of Heraclius, who following Novatian would fain close the door of reconciliation to apostates, in contrast with the merciful conduct of Eusebius, and to the excited feelings of the populace about the matter in dispute.

10. (De Rossi, Inscr. Urb. Rom. no. 251. Engraved in Vol. I. p. 847.) From the cemetery of Commodilla, Rome.

Petroniae dignae coniugi (sic) que (quae) vixit annis (annos) xxi. et fecit cum compare m(enses) a. dies vi. [Deposita est] Kal. Nob. (Novembribus) pos (post) cons(consulatus) Gratiani ter et Equiti. Ursus maritus sibi et innocenti compari fecit. Cesquet (quiescit) in pace.

The year after the consulate of Equitius, and the year after Gratian's third consulate, falls under 375 A.D., when there were no consuls (De Rossi, u. s. Proleg. p. xxx.). The two doves symbolise conjugal affection; the figure between them is an orante.

11. (De Rossi, Inscr. Urb. Rom. no. 376.) From the ruins of the basilica of St. Paul in the Via Ostiensis.

GAUDENTIVS PRESB. SIBI
ET CONIVGI SVAE SEVERAE CASTAE HAC (i.e. ac)
SANC[TAE]

FEMINAE QUAE VIXIT ANN. XLII. M. III. D. X.
DEP (depositus) III. NON. APRIL. TIMASIO ET PROMOTO [CONSS].

Gaudentius, a presbyter, made this tomb for himself and his wife Severa, a chaste and holy woman, who lived 42 years, 3 months, and 10 days. Buried April 2, in the consulship of Timasius and Promotus (i.e. A.D. 389).

Allusion to the marriages of ecclesiastics are not unfrequent in epitaphs. Thus in an epitaph in Rome, in which Petronia the wife of a deacon is the speaker, occur the beautiful lines—

*Levitae coniunx Petronia, forma pudoris,
His mea deponens sedibus ossa loco,
Parcite vos lacrimis, dulces cum coniuge natae, Vitentemque Deo credite flere nefas.*

I, Petronia, a deacon's (lit. Levite's) wife, a model of modesty, lay down and place my bones in this resting-place. Refrain from tears, my sweet daughters and husband, and believe that it is sinful to weep for one who lives in God.

The remaining lines in prose tell us that her burial took place Oct. 5, A.D. 472, and that her daughter Paula and her son Gordian were buried in the same tomb in A.D. 484 and A.D. 485, as well as Aemiliana, 'sacra virgo,' probably also a daughter, in A.D. 489 (De Rossi, u. s. no. 843; McCaul, Christ. Epist. no. 65). A lengthy inscription, probably found at Narbonne, recording the reparation of the church in A.D. 445, tells of a married bishop, Rusticus episcopus, episcopi Bonosi filius (Le Blant, u. s. no. 617).

12. (De Rossi, Inscr. Urb. Rom. no. 489.) From the cemetery of SS. Quartus and Quintus, Rome.

CALEVIUS BENDIDIT AVIN[IO] TRISOMV[M]
VBI POSITI ERANT VINI (bini) ET CALVILIUS
ET LVCIVS IN PA[CE] COS (consule) STIL[ICONE].

Calevius sold to Avinius a place for three bodies, where both Calvilius and Lucius had already been placed in peace in the consulship of Stilicho (i.e. A.D. 400).

Inscription with candlestick and various other symbols.

Remarkable for the accompanying symbols: the chrisma, the balance (cf. Dan. v. 27), the fish, the Jewish candlestick (a Jewish funeral ornament), the house (the last dwelling-place of the departed), and the mummy (Lazarus?) approached by steps, awaiting its resurrection. See McCaul (u. s. p. 49).

13. (De Rossi, u. s. n. 847. Figured in Vol. I. p. 847.) Engraved in a small tabella coemeterialis, found in situ attached to the loculus in the cemetery of St. Zoticus on the Labican Way, Rome.

This barbarous inscription may be thus rendered—

Lepusculus Leo, qui vixit annum et menses undecim, et dies decem et novem, perit septimo calendas Augustas, Honorio sexies Augusto.

Sexies, sc. consule, i.e. A.D. 404. Perit is probably a preterite: but τελευτά occurs in a Syracusan inscription, A.D. 408. It is one of several pagan words which survived in Christian times.

De Rossi does not give the size of this little slab, whose breadth does not very much exceed its height. Mr. Burgon remarks on the great difference in size of the early Christian grave-slabs in the catacombs of Rome, "some three or four feet long, yet ranging in height from a few inches to two or three feet, and some only a few inches across, either way" (Letters from Rome, p. 175).

Remarkable no less for its rustic palaeography than for its rustic spelling.

2. FRANCE.

1. (Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule, no. 58.) Lyons, in the underground chapel of St. Irénæus:—

PROCVLA . CL. FEMINA
FAMVLA . DEI .
A . TERRA . AD MARTYRES

Considered to be of the 4th century; punctuation capricious.

Famula Dei. This expression, though occurring elsewhere (see Vol. I. p. 848, b), is found in the epitaphs of Gaul and Spain only, and seems to be therein applied exclusively to the dead (Le Blant, Manuel, pp. 10, 11). The last line indicates that she has joined in glory the martyrs beside whom she lies buried.

2. (Le Blant, u. s. no. 145.) From St. Eloi in Upper Normandy, where eight other Runic inscriptions have been found:—

INGOMIR : SEN : HAGEN[s]
IN : FRIEDE :
KONOUNG : CLOUDOOUIG
CONSOUL :

(In Runic characters.)

Ingomar, son of Hagen, in peace. King Clovis being Consul.

The date is A.D. 510. A confirmation of the statement of Gregory of Tours: "Igitur Chlodovechus ab Anastasio imperatore codicillos de consulatu accepit" (Hist. Franc. lib. ii. c. 38). The absence of the name of Clovis from the Consular Fasti had caused Gregory's accuracy to be doubted (Le Blant, u. s.). Perhaps the earliest Christian Runic inscription whose date is known.

Runic Epitaph, dated by the Consulate of Clovis.

3. SPAIN.

(Hübner, u. s. no. 117. Figured in Vol. I. p. 847.)

A long marble tablet formed in an ancient wall near Arjona in Spain: remarkable for the manifold ligatures of the characters composed.

- (1) + MARIA FIDELIS CHR(IST)I IN VITA SUA
- (2) H(U)NC DILIGENS LOCUM, IBI(U)E SUMMUM
M(AN)ENS? ET R(E)BUS?
- (3) QUATUOR DENI UNO SUPERVIXIT ANNOS;

- (4) (TI)A REC(E)SSIT IN PACE D(IE) VII ID(US)
MARTIA(S), SECUNDO R-
- (5) ECCISVINTI REGNAN(TIS) C(UM) PATR(E)
PR(IN)CIPIS ANNO. (Hübner's text.)

+ *Maria, a faithful servant of Christ, who loved this place (a church?) in her life, and there at last remains and reposes (read requiescens rather than rebus), overlived fourteen years by one * * * (month or day). She departed with penitence in peace on the ninth of March, in the second year of Reccisvintus the prince reigning with his father (Chindasvindus), i.e. A.D. 650.*

This appears to be the sense of this puzzling inscription. The second line may possibly be corrupt; in the third is some omission.

4. GERMANY.

1. (Le Blant, u. s. no. 226.) Found at Trier, now in the Museum of Porta Nigra:—

HIC AMAN
TIAE IN PACE
HOSPITA C
ARO IACET .

Two doves facing, the chrisma enclosed in a wreath between them.

Here the pilgrim body of Amantia lies in peace.

The letters are neatly formed, and also the birds: perhaps of the 4th or 5th century.

For Amantia see Vol. I. p. 853. The beautiful expression hospita caro implies that heaven is the Christian's true home: and the same thing is more directly said in the Ad coelum praemisit opes in an epitaph suspected to be written by Venantius Fortunatus, who uses various equivalent expressions (Le Blant, u. s. no. 218).

5. GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

1. (Haddan and Stubbs, Counc. and Eccl. Doc. i. 164; Hübner, Inscr. Brit. Christ. no. 82.) On a stone found at Pont y Polion, Cardiganshire, in five lines:—

SERVATVR FIDAEI
PATRIQVE SEMPER
AMATOR HIC PAVLIN
VS IACIT CVLTOR PIENITI
SIMVS AEQVI.

Meant for two hexameters. Paulinus, the instructor of St. David, was present at a synod in Wales held before A.D. 569. An inscription in Old Welsh relating to St. Cadfan and king Cyngen is in a similar style and about the same date (Haddan and Stubbs, u. s.).

The other early Welsh Christian inscriptions, presumed to lie between A.D. 500 and 700, are very short and mostly barbarous. No prayers for the dead in any shape occur in any of them; little more than a hic jacet (often barbarized) and the name of the person buried, the name of the father being sometimes added. The stone sometimes has a cross within a circle. Three will suffice for this place:—(1) Porius |

hic in tumulo jacit | homo Christianus fuit. (2) On a stone bearing a cross within a circle (accompanied by a long stem running down the centre of the stone, and with an equivalent (?) inscription in Ogham characters): Cunocenni filius | Cunoceni (sic) hic jacet. (3) Chrisma of peculiar form. Carausius hic jacit | in hoc (sic) con|geries la|pidum. We have also the name (Pascent) only. (Hadden and Stubbs, u. s. pp. 164, 169; Hübner, u. s. pp. 14–55.)

2. (Bentham's Ely, p. 51. Figured in Vol. I. p. 846.)

"Found some years since at Hadenham, near Ely; the stone which seems to have been the base of a cross is square, $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet in diameter, and 14 in. thick; in the middle of the upper part is a square mortise, into which is fixed with lead another stone erect, about 4 feet high, and then broke off, which probably terminated in a cross. The inscription which fills one side of the stone is this:—

+ LVCEM. TVAM. OVINO.
DA. DEVS. ET. REQVIE.
. AMEN.

... Only one letter ε is of the Saxon cast, the rest being purely Roman" (Bentham, u. s.). Now in Ely Cathedral. Ovinus or Winn (monachus magni meriti) was the steward of Etheldreda, whom he accompanied from East Anglia on her first marriage about A.D. 652 (Beda, H. E. iv. 3). Hübner, apparently without reason, thinks this inscription much later (n. 169).

3. (Archæologia, vol. xxxiv. p. 437, pl. xxxv.; T. Fowler in Yorks. Arch. and Topogr. Journ. with more correct figure.)

Saxon Epitaph at Dewsbury. (Fowler.)

Found some years ago near the church of Dewsbury, Yorkshire, now in the possession of Dr. Hemingway. Fragment of the upper arm of a cross (apparently) with the top edge broken off; four inches across in widest part. Reads in Saxon (modified Roman) letters in seven lines:

... RHTAE BE | CUN AEFT | ER BEOR | NAE
GIBI | DDAD D | AER SA | ULE.

M. or N. set up this in memory of . . .] rht, a beacon (monument), after (on account of) the bairn. Pray for the soul.

The proper name is imperfect. Probably of the 7th century or somewhat later. Stephens (u. s. p. 464) observes that old North-English inscriptions in these letters are still rarer than those written in Runes.
CHRIST. ANT.—VOL. II.

4. (Christian Inscriptions in the Irish Language. Chiefly collected by G. Petrie. Edited by M. Stokes, vol. i. p. 15, pl. 1. Engraved, Vol. I. p. 847.)

At Clonmacnois, in King's County, now placed as a head-stone to a recent grave.

OR DO CHOLUMBON.
i.e. Pray for Colomban.

Or for oroit, equivalent to the Latin orate, which also occurs at length (p. 74). The form of the cross and character of the letters belong to the earliest period of Christian art in Ireland. There is little doubt that this is the Columbanus whose death in A.D. 624 is thus recorded in the Annals of Ulster: "Pausa Columbani, filii Bardaeni, Abbatis Clono," i.e. of Clonmacnois, where a monastery was founded about A.D. 544. The formula here used is frequent in the Irish inscriptions: thus we have Or ar Chuindless (u. s. p. 18), Or do Comgán (u. s. p. 19), both at Clonmacnois; the former supposed to be the epitaph of an abbat who died A.D. 724, the latter belonging to a person not clearly identified. We have it also in the epitaphs found at Fuerty,^{*} Inismurray, &c. In one of the Aran islands occurs, or ar. ii. canoin, i.e. pray for two canons (u. s. vol. ii. p. 21). Much more rarely the good wish takes this form, Bendachd for anmainn Joseph, i.e. a blessing on the soul of Joseph, who seems to have died in A.D. 811 at Roscommon, where the inscription is to be seen (u. s. vol. ii. p. 11; see also p. 31, bis).

The eternal house of Agatho, a reader, and of Euphemia in two graves, one for each of us. But if any of our own or any one else dare to place a body here except us two, may he give an account to God; and let him be anathema maranatha.

Perhaps of the 4th or 5th century: see domus aeterna in a Christian Roman inscription, A.D. 363 (De Rossi, I. U. R. n. 159). For similar pagan sentiments in Greek inscriptions see Ritter, De Comp. Tit. Christ. p. 24 (Berlin, 1877); and for similar execrations, pp. 37–39.

* In one instance accompanied by a fish, the only Irish example known (on a tombstone), though frequent in Scotland (vol. ii. pp. 12, 13).

*Calocaerus made this for Macedon and Sosi-genia, his sweetest parents, as their resting-place

The form of the letters (often ligated and scarcely capable of being represented by types) and the style of this beautiful inscription are considered to point to the 2nd or 3rd century.

Corycus in Cilicia in a cemetery, on the lid of a sarcophagus, upon which are four crosses.

θήκη διαφέρου||σαΓεοργίου||κυρτοκα||πίλου (corrected text). διαφέρουσα is often joined to θήκη and σωματοθήκη in various Asiatic tituli; it appears to mean particular or peculiar, i.e. in which no other body must be laid. κυρτοκάπηλος is a fishing-tackle seller. The trade of the person buried is frequently named in the sepulchral inscriptions of Cilicia and other provinces of Asia; thus we have a brazier, an oil-seller, a potter, a seaman, and several others.
The inscriptions of Corycus appear to be of the 5th and 6th centuries.

The most curious example is from Ancyra in Galatia, where Theodorus is described as being at once a presbyter and a silversmith (Böckh, C. I. G.
n. 9258). Dr. McCaul gives Latin examples from the catacombs of Rome of the mention of the secular position of various persons buried there, as count of the household troops (comes domesticorum), lawyer, prefect of the city, physician, baker, gardener, ex-quaestor, prefect of the market, keeper of a public granary (Christ. Epitaphs, pp. 28–36). M. Le Blant, therefore, must be understood with considerable limitations, “Des indications courantes sur les épitaphes des païens, la filiation, la patrie, la condition sociale, la profession . . . ne figurent point, pour ainsi dire, sur les inscriptions chré-tiennes de langue latine” (Mamel, p. 20). The inscriptions, however, where a profession is named, seem to be nearly, if not always, later than Constantine.

Representations of tools belonging to particular trades have been mentioned above as occurring at Arles, and there are other examples in the Catacombs at Rome (Martigny, Dict. s. v. Instruments).

Slaves and freedmen are occasionally mentioned in Christian inscriptions, some of which appear to be very ancient, one is certainly before Constantine (Le Blant, I. C. G. tom. i. pp. 119– 121. De Rossi, I. C. U. R. n. 5, dated A.D. 217.
Edinburgh Review, u. s. p. 240).

to Christian epigraphy. [INSCRIPTIONS, p. 851.]
Perhaps of the 3rd century, to which several inscriptions in this region belong.

Probably of the 5th or 6th century. Another very similar inscription from Nubia (n. 9120), gives the date (mutilated) taken from the era of the martyrs, probably corresponding to A.D. 489. The Egyptian epitaphs generally contain these prayerful hopes for the dead taken from the ancient liturgies. Ritter (u.s. pp. 31, 32) considers that these inscriptions are almost or quite peculiar to Egypt and Nubia, and are of Judæo-Christian origin. [C. B.]

TONSURE. The cutting off of the hair of the head wholly or partially, in some one of the modes to be hereafter mentioned, has been from the earliest times a preparatory step to taking holy orders, or to embracing the monastic life, and an outward mark of the placing of those persons who submitted to the operation under ecclesiastical law. Numerous mystical interpretations of the tonsure are mentioned by early ritualists (Amalarius, de Eccles. Off. ii. 5, iv. 39; Isidor. de Eccles. Off. i. 4; Raban. Maur. de Institut. Cleric. i. 3). The usual circular shape was believed to be an imitation of the crown of thorns. Bede speaks of St. Cuthbert "receiving the yoke of Christ and the Petrine tonsure resembling the thorny crown which encircled the head of Christ" (Vit. S. Cuthberti). Other fanciful reasons which are supposed to have induced St. Peter to institute the tonsure are given by Raban. Maur. (Lib. de Institut. Cler. i. 3, ad finem).

The act of tonsure was solemnly performed by the bishop in the case of clergy, by the abbat in the case of a monk entering a monastery, the monkish corona being somewhat larger than that of a secular priest. Instances are on record of the performance of the tonsure by the officiating priest of the church within which the ceremony took place (in the church of St. Martin of Tours), and even by the candidate for holy orders himself (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iii. 18). In Egypt and Syria it was the custom in St. Jerome's time to shave the heads of virgins on their entering the monastic profession (Hieron. Ep. 48, cont. Sabiniam); but such a custom never became prevalent in the West, and was condemned by a law of Theodosius the Great (Lib. xvi. tit. 2, de Episc. Leg. 27). [ORDERS, HOLY, p. 1491.]

It has been stated that regulations with reference to the clerical cut of hair date from a very early period, and are almost coeval with the Christian church. But the earlier of these regulations do not describe the tonsure in the later and technical sense of the term, but are merely injunctions to the clergy not to wear long hair, and have been erroneously pressed into service by eager advocates of the antiquity of the coronal tonsure. Such are the directions attributed to Anicetus A.D. 167 (Anast. in Vita; Migne, Bib. Pat. Lat. cxxvii. p. 1203), and of pope Damasus (Ep. viii.) A.D. 366-84; iv. Concil. Carthag. can. 44; Optatus, c. Parmen. lib. ii. p. 58; Hieron. xliii. in Ezech. cap. 44; Prudentius's description of St. Cyprian on his reception by the clergy at Carthage:

"Deflua caesaries compescitur ad breves capillos," Peristeph. xiii.

Socrates's description of the cutting of Julian the Apostate's hair, when he pretended to be a monk, ἐν χροῖ κερπάμενος (Hist. Ec. iii. 1); Evagrius's description of the ordination of Marcianus (Hist. Ec. iii. 26); the account of the admission to holy orders of St. Germanus of Auxerre in the 5th century (Vit. S. German. ap. Surium, 31 Jul.); and of St. Caesarius of Arles in the 6th century (ibid. 27. Aug.) The phraseology of some of these passages is consistent with, but does not necessarily prove the employment of the coronal tonsure, the first indisputable evidence for which is a 6th-century mosaic representation of St. Apollinaris of Ravenna (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. 27) and can. 41 of the fourth council of Toledo (A.D. 633), which ordered that "omnes clerici, detonso superius capite toto, inferius solam circuli coronam relinquant." A similar direction is given in Concil. Quinisext. A.D. 692, can. xxxiii.

The custom of the tonsure is said by most ritualists to have been derived by the Apostles from the Nazarites, in order that those who dedicated themselves to God's service might be distinguished likewise by the tonsure of the hair. The resemblance is not very complete, as the Nazarites cut off their hair at the close instead of at the commencement of a vow (Isidore, de Div. Off. i. 4; Alcuin, de Div. Off. edit. Hittorp. p. 61; Raban. Maur. Lib. de Institut. Cleric. i. 3). Gregory of Tours attributed its introduction to St. Peter, as a sign of humility (de Glor. Mart. i. 28), a theory which is criticised by Amalarius as possible but not proved, and he concludes by wisely leaving the origin of the tonsure an open question like the authorship of the book of Job (de Eccles. Off. ii. 5, iv. 39). It is of course most improbable that either the apostles or their successors during the period of heathen persecutions, should have received an outward mark which might at any moment lead to their detection and identification as the leaders of a religious body, the members of which were liable to the punishment of torture or of death. We have the express testimony of Hegesippus to the contrary in the case of St. James, "upon whose head no razor was ever passed" (Euseb. Hist. Ec. ii. 23).

There were three distinct varieties of ecclesiastical tonsure.

(a) The Roman tonsure, associated with the name of St. Peter, which was formed by the top of the head being shaved close, and a circle or crown of hair being left to grow round it. In breadth this coronal tonsure was said "to be like the golden crown which is placed on the head of kings" (Isidore, de Div. Off. ii. 4).

(b) The Eastern or Greek tonsure, styled St. Paul's, which was total. When Theodore was selected to be archbishop of Canterbury (A.D. 668) he was obliged to wait four months to let his hair grow in such a manner as would enable him to receive the coronal tonsure in the Roman manner, "for he had previously, as subdeacon, received the tonsure of St. Paul, according to the manner of the Easterns" (Bede, Hist. Ec. iv. 1).

(c) The Celtic tonsure, known as St. John's, in use in the Celtic church of Great Britain and Ireland. It consisted in shaving all the hair in front of a line drawn over the top of the head from ear to ear. The Anglo-Saxon church attributed this form of tonsure in use among their opponents to Simon Magus. Abbat Ceolfrid discussed the subject at length in his letter to Nectan, king of the Picts, A.D. 710 (Bede, Hist. Ec. v. 21). Although not brought forward by St. Augustine either at Augustine's Oak or at Bangor this question of the shape of the tonsure formed the subject of the most frequent and violent controversy in England during the 7th and 8th centuries. There are traces of the same controversy in France, where a Saxon colony at Bayeux had copied the Celtic tonsure from the Bretons before A.D. 590 (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. x. 9), and in Spain, where a tonsure like the Celtic was condemned by Conc. Tolet. iv. A.D. 633, can. xli. [Further details are given by Bede, H. E. iv. 1; Gildas, Epist. ii.; Aldhelm, Epist. ad Geruntium in Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c. iii. 268; Mabillon, Ann. Benedict. i. 528; Act. SS. ord. Bened. saec. ii. pp. 119-20; Chamillard, de Corona tonsura et habitu cleric.; Martene, de Antiq. Eccl'es. Rit. tom. ii. p. 14, edit. 1788.] [F. E. W.]

TORMENT, PLACE OF (IN ART). The only representations of any place of bodily punishment, beyond the grave and in the spiritual state, which the writer knows of as possibly within our period, are the hell of the Torcello mosaics, and the numerous pits or rapidly sketched infernos, generally with ministering demons, found in the Utrecht Psalter. [See RESURRECTION.] The writer counted eighteen in the first half of that extraordinary work (see woodcut). But the dates of both these documents are very doubtful. It is particularly curious in the Utrecht Psalter, that there (for the first time in Christian imagery as far as he knows) the mouth of hell is sometimes an actual mouth, belonging most frequently to a monstrous head, sometimes quasi-human, sometimes nearer the fish or serpent-monster of the Giottesque infernos. The idea may be derived from the vision of Er, in Plato's Republic, bk. x. The souls in that allegory who have passed round the circle of the rivers of punishment are allowed to try to leave Tartarus by its mouth; which lets them pass, if their purgation is complete. If not, it roars horribly, and the sinner has to go back and repeat his circuit of Phlegethon and Cocytus. But this subject is not really a part of Christian iconography, even of the first millennium. It came into prominence with races like the Lombard, accustomed to every form of slaughter and terror, and also full of inventive genius. [R. S. T. T.]

bald to support Nicetius, metropolitan of Treves, in whose province Toul lay, in his struggle with persons excommunicated for incestuous acts. (Mansi, ix. 147-50.) [E. S. Ff.]

TOURS, COUNCILS OF (TURONENSIA CONCILIA), A.D. 461 and A.D. 567. Both remarkable for the length of their disciplinary canons; the first, at which thirteen were passed, to which Perpetuus, bishop of Tours, and seven bishops, a blind bishop through his presbyter, and Thalassius, bishop of Angers, on their being communicated to him, subscribed (Mansi, vii. 943-8); the second, at which no less than twenty-seven were passed, and subscribed to by Euphronius, bishop of Tours, and eight others (Mansi, ix. 789-814). Both were celebrated in honour of St. Martin, but the latter was held in his church, as though it had been finished in the interval between them. [E. S. Ff.]

TOWER. We have now so long been accustomed to see a tower either attached to or immediately adjoining a church, that many persons would be disposed to make the presence of a tower the distinctive mark of a church, and its absence that of a chapel. Such, however, would be a very great mistake as regards the churches of the earlier centuries of Christianity. Until bells came to be in general use a tower would have served no other purpose in connexion with a church than that of a place of security for the servants and treasures of the church in the event of an attack from brigands or enemies. Towers, therefore, did not in the earlier ages invariably form part of the design of a church.

In the centre of cruciform churches towers may, however, have been erected rather for æsthetic reasons than for any special use, as the raising the central part of such a church obviously greatly adds to its beauty and dignity. The germ of the central tower may perhaps be found in such buildings as the sepulchral chapel of SS. Nazzaro and Celso at Ravenna [CHAPEL, p. 346], built before A.D. 450, where the intersection of nave, transepts, and chancel is covered by a dome enclosed in a low square tower.

It has been shewn in the article BELL that bells, and probably bells of considerable size, were well known in Gaul and England in the 6th and 7th centuries, and in Italy doubtless they were known as early, if not even earlier. Towers were of course familiar objects, and it may easily have occurred to some ecclesiastic or architect that a tower adjacent or annexed to a church would afford a convenient means of so hanging bells that their sound would travel freely.

The earliest examples of towers connected with, or adjacent to, churches would seem to be the towers of some of the churches at Ravenna. Hübisch (Altchristl. Kirchen) asserts that the lower part of the tower at the cathedral shews that it is of the same date as the adjacent baptistery (attributed to A.D. 425), by the fact that the quality and form of the bricks, and the manner in which they are laid, are identical in the two structures. On like grounds he considers that the square tower of S. Francesco (see woodcut) and the circular one at S. Giovanni Evangelista date from the latter part of the 5th century, and that at S. Apollinare in Classe (v. CHURCH, p. 376) from the period of the building of the church (A.D. 568).

On similar evidence the same writer thinks that part of the towers of S. Pudenziana and S. Lorenzo at Rome are as early as the 7th century. Certainly no one who knows how safe a guide the character of brickwork at Rome is as to the dates of buildings will be disposed to disregard the opinion expressed by Herr Hübsch, but the earliest documentary evidence of the building of a tower in connexion with a church at Rome would appear to be the mention in the Liber Pontificalis of the tower built by pope Stephen III. (A.D. 768-772) at St. Peter's, in which three bells were placed "to call together the clergy and people to the service of God." This passage is given by Ducange, but does not appear in all editions of the Liber Pontif. If genuine, it certainly seems to point to the introduction of a practice which had something of novelty about it.

Tower of S. Francesco, Ravenna.
(From Hübsch's Altger.-it. Kirchen.)

In the life of pope Leo IV. (A.D. 847-855) in the Liber Pontif., it is stated that he at the church of St. Andrew the Apostle "fecit campanile et posuit campanam cum malleo aereo," as if there were something rather unusual and remarkable in the fact of a hammer being used to strike the bell. The fact that while at Rome there are nearly thirty churches, portions of which are of earlier date than A.D. 800, while the existing bell-towers are, with very doubtful exceptions, of later date, and that no early mention of the construction of towers is to be found in the Liber Pontif., which enters into such full detail upon the works done by the successive popes to the various churches, would seem to make it almost certain that, as has been said before, it was not until a comparatively late date that a tower was deemed to be at all an essential adjunct to a church; and, indeed, many of the older churches in that city remain to the present day unfurnished with such an appendage. Two churches (built 827-824), Sta. Cecilia and Sta.

Prassede, shew clearly that a tower did not form part of the original plans; in the first case, it is awkwardly wedged in in a corner; in the latter it has been raised on the end of a transept.

The early examples above mentioned are all detached from the neighbouring churches, but towers forming internal parts of churches of very early date are to be found in central Syria. The annexed woodcut of a part of the front of the church at Taftkha, from Comte de la Vogüé's work, shews the three-storied tower which forms part of the façade. This church, Comte de la Vogüé says, is probably of the 4th, but cannot be later in date than the 5th, century. At Tourmanin, in the same country, are remains of a church which the same authority attributes to the 9th century; here are two western towers, which, however, do not rise above the roof.

Towers were, it would seem, built as portions of churches in England at an early date, for a square tower annexed to the nave is to be found at Brixworth in Northamptonshire, which there is some historical ground for believing to have been built before A.D. 700 (v. the Basilica, &c., by the Rev. C. F. Watkins, and Britton, Chron. Hist. of Christian Architecture, p. 192). That the existing building is really of an early date is the more probable as the head of an original window in the wall between the tower and the nave has been altered by the insertion of a window of three lights, divided by two balusters; this alteration is supposed to have been a part of the repairs effected after A.D. 870, when the monastery was devastated by the Danes.

Another early example of a tower is afforded by the church in Dover Castle; in this case the tower is in the centre, resting on four semi-circular arches. No historical or documentary date from which the period of the erection of this church can be inferred have been brought forward, but the character of the architecture is much the same as that of Brixworth, the arches in both cases being square-edged, and constructed chiefly with large flat tiles; in Brixworth of Roman make, and at Dover, it would seem, imitative of that manufacture, being much inferior in quality to those of which the adjacent pharos is built.

Another feature these churches have in common, viz. windows of large size, measuring, at Dover, 7 ft. 2 in. by 3 ft. 8 in., and at Brixworth 5 ft. 10 in. by 3 ft. 6 in.; these dimensions much exceed those of windows of churches of the same proportions of the 11th or 12th centuries, and this is what is just to be found in the churches at Rome earlier than A.D. 1000. Windows may be seen in some of these, e.g. the clerestory of S. Lorenzo fuor le Mura (772-795?), and the windows in the transept of St. Prassede (817-824); which approach very closely in size, proportion, and construction, to those of Brixworth and Dover. In Rome the great window spaces were filled with pierced marble slabs (v. Churches in Rome before A.D. 1000, Archaeologia, vol. xl.). In England wood may probably have served in place of marble, and the apertures in the wooden slabs filled with horn, or other semi-transparent substances, or even with glass, the use of which for such purposes was, as we are told by Bede, introduced by Benedict, bishop about A.D. 675. It is possible that in both these cases the towers may have been built with the view not only of hanging bells, but also as affording places of security for the treasures of the church and its ministers; some of the latter may even have dwelt in them, as was so frequently the case in Ireland during the middle ages.

The history of the detached slender circular towers with conical caps, which are peculiar to Ireland, was very carefully investigated by the late Earl of Dunraven, and his notes and conclusions have been well edited and commented on by Miss Stokes, who expresses an opinion based mainly on the character of the masonry of the towers, and its correspondence with that of buildings, the date of which can be approximately fixed, that none of these towers now existing in Ireland can be believed to date from an earlier period than the latter part of the 9th century. But see ROUND TOWERS.

The foundations of two circular towers, one on each side of the altar end of the old cathedral at Brescia, still exist; the date of this church has not been ascertained, but it may be as early as the 8th century. Hübsch (Alt - Christliche Kirchen) places it between 600 and 750.

According to the restoration suggested by the same author the original plan of S. Lorenzo at Milan comprised four towers at the angles of the buildings; this church is not later than the 6th century.

In the church of Romain Motier in Switzerland, which was dedicated in 753, is a low but perfectly-developed central tower, and it seems not unlikely that if we had more examples of this century in existence we should find that then or afterwards, on this side of the Alps at any rate, a tower, either central or at the west end, frequently, if not even generally, formed a portion of every important church. We find, however, in the plan prepared for the monastery of St. Gall [CHURCH, p. 383] about 820, only two circular towers, one on each side of one of the apses, and connected with the church only by narrow passages.

In the dome at Aix-la-Chapelle we have at the west end a tower-like building flanked by two circular towers containing staircases.

Several churches in France of about the same date as St. Martin at Angers, founded in 819, and Germigny-sur-Loire, dedicated in 806, have central towers.

In the countries where the Eastern church was predominant towers do not appear to have been built in connexion with churches until a late period. An exceptional instance is that of the erection of a bell-tower at St. Sophia, in Constantinople, between 867 and 880, by the emperor Basil, to receive bells sent to him by Orso, Doge of Venice; at no time do they appear to have been commonly built. The central cupola is, however, in the mediæval churches of the Byzantine type so much elevated as to present something of the appearance of an octagonal tower. [A. N.]

TRACTORIAE. [COUNCIL, p. 475.]

TRACTUS. [PSALMODY, p. 1745.]

TRADES (including PROFESSIONS). The only pursuits absolutely interdicted by the church were those associated with idolatry, such as statuary and painting (so far as they involved the fashioning of idols or the representation of false divinities), or those of a directly immoral tendency, such as the theatrical profession, as practised in these times. [ACTORS, THEATRE.] Tertullian (de Idololat. c. 6), in condemning the trade in idols, replies to the supposed excuse: "Facio, sed non colo," by asking how it is possible "to disavow in speech what we confess with the hand, to destroy with words what we construct by our actions, to proclaim but one God and to make many?" The artificer, he affirms, is even more culpable than the priest: "plus es illis quam sacerdos, cum per te habeant sacerdotem" (Migne, i. 668). On like grounds, he condemns with equal severity the trade in incense, a peculiarly lucrative one in his day; and he concludes that every art, profession, and trade which ministers to idol worship is itself a species of idolatry.

As regarded other ordinary modes of money-making, they were in no way looked upon by the early church as incompatible with the duties of the Christian life. Tertullian, when repudiating the notion that Christianity involved a withdrawal from ordinary society, says (Apol. c. 42), "we carry on trades among you" (i.e. among the pagan world of the 3rd century). Eusebius (Den. Evang. i. 8; Migne, Series Græca, xxii. 30) says that the pursuits of agriculture, of the market-place, and of civic industry generally, are perfectly compatible with a God-fearing life. The only requirements of the church, indeed, in these relations, appear to have been honesty and moderation. Tertullian (de Patientiâ, c. 7) contrasts the impatience of the pagan trader under losses, and the eager desire of gain which seemed to hold it preferable to life itself, with the Christian view which teaches us to prefer our spiritual welfare to the acquirement of wealth (Migne, i. 1262; Cyprian, de Orat. Dom. c. 20). Cyprian (de Lapsis, c. 6) states that many bishops in his time had abandoned their sacred profession to seek the acquirement of wealth in distant provinces, attending markets, and even lending out money on usury: "negotiationis quaestuosae multitudinis aucupari . . . usuris multiplicantibus fœnus augere" (Migne, iv. 183).

It is, however, to be remembered that, according to the traditions of the empire, all trades were looked upon as unworthy of a free citizen and, to some extent, disreputable. It is probable, therefore, that in the earlier centuries they were largely carried on by Christians. Justin Martyr (ad Zenam et Serenam, c. 17) repudiates the notion that Christians should be ashamed to labour for fear of sinking in public estimation. The Apostolic Constitutions (iv. 11) enjoin that children shall be taught some useful art. The legislation of the state, after the recognition of Christianity, does not appear to indicate a juster sense of the dignity of labour; and the removal of the capital to Constantinople was followed by a marked decline in the commercial prosperity of the empire. "The humble and honest occupation of the shopkeeper," says Finlay, "was treated as a dishonourable profession, and his condition was rendered doubly contemptible. He was made the serf of the corporation in which he was inscribed, and his industry was fettered by restrictions which compelled him to remain in poverty" (Hist. of Greece, ed. Tozer, i. 117; Cod. Theod. IX. xxiii. 1). St. Basil (Hom. 3 in Hexameron) says in one of his sermons that he is aware that there are present among his audience a good many artisans (τεχνίται τῶν βαναδῶν τεχνῶν) who are wanting to get away to their work, and are consequently anxious for him to shorten his discourse (Migne, S. G. xxix. 22). It is evident, however, that the untruthfulness in which traders habitually indulged often made commercial pursuits difficult for a Christian. Augustine, in commenting on the 15th verse of Psalm lxxi. (Septuag. Vers. No. lxx.), and adopting the reading of the Septuagint—"for I am not acquainted with the ways of men"—renders the Greek word παραμαρτίας by "negotiators," and says: "Audiant negotiatores, et mutant vitam." He then proceeds to point out that trading and truth-telling are not incompatible. He supposes the "negotiator" to urge in his defence that the labourer is worthy of his hire; and that bringing, as he does, his wares from a distance to supply a public want, he is entitled to a profit. But this, replies Augustine, is not the point in question, "agitur de mendacio, de perjurio;" and he maintains that the vice is not inherent in the transaction, but is the fault of the vendor. He advises him to confess candidly what he has given for his wares, and to state what he demands as his fair profit: "Possem enim dicere, Tanto emi, sed tanto vendam; si placet, eme." He thinks that tradesmen who acted thus would greatly increase their custom. He also rebukes with severity another common phase of mercantile disingenuousness; as, for example, when a shoemaker, on receiving an order for a pair of shoes, promises them by a certain time; but, on receiving further orders, puts the first order aside and disappoints his customer (Migne, xxxvii. 886).

In the West, by a series of changes which cannot be very clearly discerned, we find that in the 5th century a remarkable change had taken place in the respect paid to labour. Trades and crafts formerly carried on almost exclusively by slaves are to be found, especially in the municipal cities of Gaul, in the hands of free men who united themselves in corporations for the protection of their interests (Guizot, Hist. de la Civilisat. i. 52).

The following examples are given by Martigny from various collections of inscriptions in the catacombs and elsewhere, which illustrate the occupations pursued by Christians in the earlier centuries:—

Of a "rationalis," or collector of taxes (Airinghi, i. 406); of a "scutarius," or maker of shields (ib. 117); of dealers in purple (cf. Acts xvi. 14), of silversmiths, blacksmiths, carpenters, lapidaries, potters, tanners, tent-makers, weavers, colliers, and fishermen (see Lami, de Erudit. Apost. p. 184). Marchi (Monumenti delle Arte Crist. p. 26) gives an epitaph of a female vendor of barley, and (p. 28) that of a "linearius," or linen-weaver. De Rossi (i. 212) furnishes us with that of a baker—BITALIS PISTOR; and that of a "pastellarius," or maker of rolls, is found after the 5th century; that of one Marcellus, patron of the corporation of the "pastellarii," is given by Muratori (527, v). We find also epitaphs of one Lucilius Victorinus, a manufacturer of dice—ARTIS TESSALARIE LUSORIE (Boldetti, p. 416); of a "confectarius," or pork butcher (Muratori, cmliv. 5), and find from Gruter (ccclxi. 5) that the "confectarii" formed a corporation along with the "suarii," or dealers in swine; of a "capsarius" (Marchi, p. 27), or keeper of the clothes at a public bath; of a sculptor, with design of his chisel and puncheon (Rossi, i. 188); of a painter, with similar designs of compass, puncheon, and brushes (Marangoni, Acta S. Vict. p. 125); of a public measurer of corn, accompanied by designs of a "modius" full of wheat, and a measuring rod (Lupi, Ser. Epitaph. p. 51); of a "faber," with the design of a shovel; of a Christian lady, SEVERA SELEUCIANE, on whose tomb there is the design of a weaving loom (Lupi, Opp. Laud. pp. 28, 29); designs of combs (ib. pp. 22, 29, 30) designate "lanarius pectinarius." Fabretti (Insc. Ant. Expl. p. 574) shews us a poor "colonus" named Leon. Perret (V. lii.) gives us the representation of a sower. Marini (Inscriz. Alban. p. 188) supplies us with the only known example of a "pincerna," or cupbearer, though Lami (de Erud. Apost. p. 230) says that this was an office often filled by Christians. The "fossores," who prepared the tombs in the catacombs, are frequently represented by a spade, or some other implement of their profession (Boldetti, pp. 53, 59, 65; Perret, i. 30). Boldetti (p. 184) gives a design which he supposed to represent an instrument of martyrdom, but which De Rossi (Bollettino, 1864, p. 36) has explained as designed for a dentist's instrument for extracting teeth with an extracted tooth by the side.

The evidence with respect to professions has an almost entirely different significance. The military profession and those of the "grammaticus," the "rhetor," and the jurist, were generally held in high honour, and instances of Christians in these, during the earlier centuries, are comparatively rare. In the legal profession there occur the names of Minucius Felix, the senators Hippolytus and Apollonius (Baldin. Præf. in Manu. Ed.), and Tertullian, according to Eusebius (H. E. v. 21), was distinguished by his knowledge of Roman law. De Rossi (i. 64) gives an inscription on the tomb of a Christian juriconsult, which records that he was honoured by the friendship of Constantine during the emperor's sojourn in Rome. The profession of the healing art, often adopted by slaves, appears to have been far more common among Christians. The name of St. Luke at once suggests itself. Boldetti (p. 416 et pass.) gives a large number of inscriptions of this class. Reinesius gives the epitaph of one Alexander, a physician, who is said to have been ΧΡΙΣΤΙΑΝΟC ΚΑΙ ΠΝΕΥΜΑΤΙΚΟC (Synag. 898, v.), the latter probably denoting that he belonged to a class of empirics who in their diagnosis profess to refer every symptom to the πνεῦμα. Airinghi (i. 415) gives the epitaph of one Timothy, an "archiaterus" or "princeps medicorum," an officer who was also physician in ordinary to the emperor. Christian freedmen appear as discharging, in the service of the emperor or of senators, the offices of secretary "commentariensis" (Lami, de Erudit. Apost. p. 250), of "librarius" or copyist, of "tabellarius" or courier who carried despatches (Passionei, 124, n. 84), of "arcarius" or treasurer, and "cubicularius" or groom of the bedchamber. Lucian, head of the "cubicularii" of Diocletian's palace, was instrumental in the conversion of many to the Christian faith (Tillemont, Hist. Eccl. v. 7, 8, 180). An instance of a Christian holding the office of "scrinarius" or keeper of the archives, an important function, and one involving considerable attainments, occurs in Airinghi (i. 415). The father of St. Basil was a teacher of rhetoric equally famed for his eloquence and his Christian virtues. The profession of a "grammaticus" was not common among the earlier Christians, probably on account of its association with pagan observances (see SCHOOLS). De Rossi (i. 1242) gives us the epitaph of a "magister ludi" and also (i. 1167) that of a "magister ludi litterarii." The military profession, though often disavowed by certain sects and by individuals, does not appear, at any time, to have been actually forbidden by the church (see WAR, and, for other points connected with the whole subject, COMMERCE). [J. B. M.]

TRADITIO SYMBOLI, the solemn delivery of the creed to the catechumens as their baptism drew nigh. We only read of it in connexion with the more numerous baptisms of Easter Eve, but it is certain that a similar discipline prevailed with reference to those of Whitsun Eve. At Rome it took place on a day appointed by notice in the fourth week of Lent (Ordo Scrutini, 6, in Mus. Ital. ii. 79). Wednesday was the usual day (Assemani, Codex Liturg. i. 93, "feria quarta, seu illa feria;" see Amalaris, de Eccl. Off. i. 8; Ordo Rom. in Hittorp. de Eccl. Cath. Off. 31, ed. 1). At Milan the creed was given on Saturday in Passion Week (See SABBATUM, &c., p. 1827). In Gaul, before the Roman scrutinium and other rites were forced on the national churches (Capit. Reg. Franc. v. 372), Palm Sunday was the day universally observed. This appears from the internal evidence of the "Missae in Symboli Traditione" in the Gallican sacramentaries, which refer to the entry into Jerusalem (Miss. Goth. in Lit. Gall. 235; Miss. Gall. Vet. ib. 346; Sacram. Gall. in Mus. Ital. i. 314), and from the thirteenth canon of Agde, A.D. 506. The lessons or Palm Sunday in the Gallican lectionary (Lit. Gall. 127) are obviously chosen with an eye to this rite (Jer. xxx. 1-34; Heb. x. 3-34; John xii. 1-24). In Gothic Spain it took place on the same day (Isid. Hispal. de Eccl. Off. i. 27), but not everywhere in Spain; for the council of Braga (now in Portugal) in 572 (can. 1) says that the creed is to be taught the catechumens "in the twenty days" before their baptism. The traditio, then, was some three weeks before Easter, in which the church of western Spain seems to have agreed, or nearly agreed, with the churches of Greece and Asia. There has been a controversy about the time of the traditio in proconsular Africa. The Benedictine editors of St. Augustine infer from his language in Serm. 212 "in Traditione Symboli," that it took place "die ante Pascha serius oculus quinto decimo" (note u. s.), while Martene argues from the same premises that it was "sabbato ante dominicam quadragesimae" (De Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. 11, n. 11). The redditio or repetition of it to the bishop was eight days later when the catechumens received the Lord's Prayer, and again on Easter Eve before their baptism (Aug. Serm. 58, §§ 1, 13).

We have also less precise information on the practice of the Greek and Oriental churches than on those of Gaul, Spain and Italy. St. Jerome, A.D. 397, writing in Palestine, says, "Consuetudo autem apud nos istiusmodi est, ut his qui baptizandi sunt per xl. dies publice tradamus sanctam et adorandam Trinitatem." From this we should infer that the creed was delivered at the beginning of Lent, unless, which seems improbable, it was only imparted piecemeal during the whole course of it. We find Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 347, explaining the first article of it in his fourth catechetical lecture delivered not far from the beginning of that season, and in the fourteen that follow dealing with doctrines exclusively Christian.

The only early notice of time in the church of Constantinople with which I am able to meet occurs in the statement of Theodorus Lector, that before the time of Timotheus, A.D. 511, the Nicene creed was "recited only once in the year, viz. on the holy day of preparation (parasceve) of the divine Passion at the time of the catechisings held by the bishop" (Hist. Eccl. ii. 32). We can only suggest that the Apostles' creed was used in earlier catechisings by the priests.

The delivery of the creed was in the Latin church preceded by a short address, "praeformatio symboli" (Sacram. Gelas.; Assemani, Codex Liturg. i. 11; Ord. Scrut. 6, u. s.; Miss. Gall. Vet. in Lit. Gall. 339; Sacram. Gall. in Mus. Ital. i. 310. Comp. Catech. Graec. Ass. 111).

It was afterwards explained in detail (Aug. Serm. 214; the Sacramentaries, u. s.). St. Augustine has three sermons (212, 213, 214) "in Traditione Symboli;" but the office books give forms to be used on the occasion.

According to the earlier Roman ritual the creed was said in Greek over the male candidates, and in Latin over the female (Martene, u. s., I. i. 12, ord. 2 (MS. Gellon); Pontif. Pictav. ib. ord. 3; ord. 4, ad Scrut. MS. Werten. ib. &c.). In the Gallican it was said in Latin only, but over each sex (Miss. Gall. Vet. u. s. 340; Jesse Ambianensis, de Baptismo, § 1). In the Gelasian Sacramentary, as we have it, it is given both in Latin and Greek, but both are said over all the candidates.

The day on which the delivery took place was called by the Latins "Dies in Apertione Auriurum" (Sacram. Gelas. i. 34; Murat. i. 537; Miss. Gall. Vet. in Lit. Gall. 342; Jesse Amb. u. s., &c.) It had a proper mass, "Missa in Symboli Traditione" (Miss. Goth. u. s. 235; Gall. Vet. 346; Sacram. Gall. u. s. 314; Miss. Ambros. u. s. 336).

The creed used was at first everywhere a form identical with or closely akin to the Apostles' creed (Miss. Gall. Vet. u. s. 348; Sacr. Gall. u. s. 312; Isid. Hispal. de Eccl. Off. ii. 22; Raban. Maur. de Instit. Cler. i. 27; Ord. Rom. Bernoldi in Hittorp. de Eccl. Off. 32, ed. 1; Ordd. 9, 10 in Martene, u. s., "Credo in Deum," &c.); but when the Nicene creed was generally adopted into the liturgies it was also chosen in many churches for the instruction and profession of catechumens (see for the Latin, Sacram. Gelas. Assem. u. s. 11; Greg. ib. 22; Ord. Scrut. 97; Ord. 5 in Martene, u. s.; for the Greek, Assem. u. s. 114, 138; Armenian, ib. 172; Syrian, 212, 238, 252, 271). There is early evidence of the Greek use of this creed, as in the statement of Theodore already quoted. The council of Constantinople, A.D. 518, speak of it as "the holy symbol in which we were baptized and do baptize" (Epist. Sym. ad Joan., Labb. Conc. v. 166). Some monks memorialising a later council at the same place (A.D. 536) express themselves in the same manner (ib. 172). Similarly, Caesar Basiliscus writing to Timothy Aelurus, "The symbol of the 318 fathers . . . into which we and all who have believed before us have been baptized" (Evagrius, Hist. Eccl. iii. 4). The Copts use a short form declaring belief in the Three Persons of the Trinity (Assem. i. 159). In one Latin Ordo an option is given, "Credo in Deum" or "Credo in Unum Deum" (Martene, u. s. ord. 4). [W. E. S.]

TRADITORES. Those who in the time of the Diocletian persecution delivered up their Bibles, and sacred utensils for destruction: "Post Cypriani mortem 40 annis peractis traditio codicum facta est, unde coeperunt appellari traditores" (Aug. de Bapt. contr. Donat. vii. 2). The charge of betraying sacred books was urged in turn against the Catholics and the Donatists (Aug. Epp. l., elxii., elxiv., De Verb. Dom. xviii. 19; Contra Crescon. iii. 27). The first council of Arles, A.D. 314 (c. 13), held immediately after the persecution, decreed that any clergyman convicted, not by hearsay but by manifest acts, of having betrayed either the sacred Scriptures or the church vessels or the names of the brethren, was to be deposed. TRANQUILLINUS, July 6, martyr at Rome under Diocletian (Mart. Usuard., Flor., Adon., Vet. Rom., Rom.); Dec. 18 (Mérol. Græc. Sirlot.). [C. H.]

TRANSENNA. In classical usage "transenna" stands for any piece of reticulated work, either a net or snare for catching birds (Plaut. Bacchis, iv. 6, 22; Persa, iv. 3, 11; Rudens, iv. 7, 10), or a wicker hurdle, or lattice, or anything imitating that form. In this sense it was applied to a carved grating filling up the aperture of a window, admitting the light, but hindering those outside from looking in, called by the Greeks δυσκρωτόν. An example of this arrangement is to be seen in the church of Sylvester, below that of St. Martino ai Monti, in Rome. "Per transennam aspicere" was a common Latin proverb found in Cicero (de Oratore, lib. i. c. 35).

Paulinus of Nola also describes the "transenna" as adapted to a window opening, "laetissimo vero conspectu tota haec basilica, aperitur tribus arcubus paribus perlucante transenna" (Epist. 12, ad Sever.).

In Christian Antiquities "transenna" is applied to the carved marble gratings used both to fill up the openings of the "cancelli" in the churches and oratories (precisely as in those of the secular basilicas, of which an excellent example has been found in the recently excavated "basilica Jovis" on the Palatine Hill), and to protect the shrines of the martyrs from too rude handling, while they afforded a distant and mysterious view of the sacred treasures, and allowed handkerchiefs and napkins called "brandea" to be put through the lattice work, and bring back healing virtue from contact with the consecrated coffer. A "transenna" in this last sense was completed of pure silver by Sixtus III. about the tomb of St. Lawrence, "ornavit transennam et altare et confessionem sancti martyris Laurentii" (Anastas. in Sixto III. § 65). The design of a "transenna" discovered in the cemetery of St. Callistus is given by Boldetti (Osservaz. p. 35). One published by De Rossi (Inscr. Christian. tom. i. proleg. cxv. Northcote, ed. 2, pl. ix.) bears a curious inscription of the end of the 3rd century, together with an earlier one partially obliterated. From the former we learn that it was originally prepared by a heathen lady for the reception of her own epitaph. It was subsequently taken possession of, as the later inscription records, by a deacon named Severus, who clumsily set it horizontally instead of vertically, to guard the aperture of a "cubiculum duplex cum arcusolio et luminare" constructed for himself and his family by the permission of pope Marcellinus. This "transenna," which is one of elegant design, measures 6 feet by 3 feet. The inscriptions are on a plain oblong slab in the centre. The design of the "transennae" of the "cancelli" and of the altar of what is known as the papal crypt in the cemetery of St. Callistus, has been faithfully restored by De Rossi from the fragments discovered, and the supposed arrangement is given (tav. 1, A. of the second volume of his Roma Sotterranea. See woodcut). The use of the "transenna" to fence in the "confessio" is still seen at St. Clement's. Perret gives beautiful examples from St. Priscilla and St. Helena.

Transenna. Roma Sotterranea (pl. ix. new edition).

The life of Stephen IV. (Anastas. § 274) affords an instance of the use of the word in its first meaning as a fence. A presbyter named Waldepertus, who had fled for refuge to the church of St. Mary ad Martyres, was dragged out and thrown "juxta transennam campi Laterani," where his eyes were dug out.

Martigny (sub voce) presents a beautiful and elaborate example of a "transenna" from a church at Cherchel, in North Africa, with the letters A and Ω forming elements of the lattice work. [E. V.]

TRANSFIGURATION (IN ART). This event in our Lord's history had no place in the ordinary cycles of art representations in the early church. It occurs, however, two or three times in mosaics, and has been found in some minor works of art. The most remarkable is that of the 6th century at St. Apollinare in Classe, already described in the article MOSAICS (p. 1333). Here the representation is almost entirely symbolical. A jewelled cross within a circle of glory occupies the central place, on either side demi-figures of Moses and Elias float in clouds, while three sheep among the trees on the hill below represent the apostles. The Transfiguration is also depicted in a mosaic of the 6th century in the chapel of the convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai (La Borde, Voyage dans l'Arabie), and in an ill-designed clumsy work of the 8th century in the church of SS. Nereus and Achilleus at Rome (MOSAICS, p. 1333). Martigny states that Millin mentions the subject being found on a sarcophagus at Ostia, but he gives no reference to the place. Raoul Rochette speaks of it as being seen on a lamp discovered in a catacomb at Corneto (see also D'Agincourt, Script. lxii. no. 24, 28). [E. V.]

TRANSFIGURATION OF CHRIST, commemorated July 14 (Cal. Armen.); Aug. 6 (Cal. Byzant.; Cal. Ethiop.; Basil. Menol.; Menol. Grace. Sirlet.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 265; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

TRANSITORIUM, the anthem sung after the communion (see COMMUNIO, p. 412) in the Ambrosian liturgy (Radulphus Tugur. de Canonum observ. Prop. 23, in Mac. Biblioth. Vet. Patr. xxvi. 319). It is so called because, while it is being sung, the priest leaves his place and "transfert missale ad aliam partem altaris" (Rubr. in Missali Ambr. A.D. 1669; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. iv. 12, n. 3). See an example in Pamelius, Liturgica, i. 305.

TRECENSE CONCILIUM. [TROYES.]

TREES IN ART. The trees so frequently seen in the early Christian mosaics and frescoes, and on gilded glasses, sarcophagi, and other objects of art, are commonly, as Bosio acknowledges (lib. iv. c. 44), simply ornamental accessories devoid of any symbolical meaning, though in some cases it is probable that we may not be wrong in regarding them as typical of the Tree of Life, an emblem of immortality, and of Christians as trees of the Lord's planting. This is certainly the case with the palm-tree. [PALM TREE.] The trees between which the Good Shepherd is often placed, sometimes with the adjuncts of birds and a milk-pail (Perret, Catacombes, V. pl. xlviiii., lxxvii.; Agincourt, iv. vii. 10), may be safely regarded as decorative, though a symbolical meaning may be easily read into them. The same may be said of the trees which accompany the raising of Lazarus, sometimes growing out of the tomb (Buonarruoti, tav. vii. 2) or in part of it (Bottari, tav. vii. 2), and of those between which the "orantes" often stand; sometimes with a lamb on either side (Perret, V. v.). St. Agnes is so depicted (Buonarruoti, tav. xviii.-xxi.; Bottari, tav. xviii. 4). The symbolical reference is more unmistakable when a tree or a branch is depicted between A and Ω (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. tom. ii. p. 323), and where a green tree, rich in flowers and fruit, is opposed to one that is dry (Le Blant, Inscr. Christ. pp. 390, 394, 409). Compare PARADISE. [E. V.]

TREVES, COUNCIL OF (TREVIRENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 385, at which St. Martin was beguiled into being present, when Ithacius, the accuser of Priscillian, was acquitted, and Felix ordained bishop of Treves. (Mansi, iii. 679-84.) [E. S. F.]

TRIANGLE. For this emblem, which is rarely used in the early church, and has been little noticed in consequence, Martigny refers almost entirely to a learned article by M. de Rossi, in the Spicilegium Solesmense, vol. iv. p. 497, on some inscriptions from Carthage.

Triangle. (Martigny, p. 641.)

These examples are almost the only ones known. [See MONOGRAM.] The first will be found in Aringhi (Rom. Subt. i. p. 605), the second and third are Lupi's (Sev. Epitaph. pp. 64, 102), the fourth in Boldetti's Cimit. p. 402. The fifth and sixth, with the monogram and enclosing the A and ω were found by De Rossi in a MS. of the Barberini library, and published by M. E. Le Blant (Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, t. i. p. 107), the last is on the fifth of the former's African marbles (in the Spicilegium).

Three fishes arranged in the form of a triangle are represented in Munter's Sinnbilder, p. 49, tab. i. 26. And, as Martigny observes, all the triangles are closely connected with the Monogram, the special symbol or name of the Second Person of the Holy Trinity. [R. St. J. T.]

TRIBIMAEUS, Mar. 1, martyr at Perga with Nestor under Decius (Basil. Menol.).

TRIBUNAL. [IMMUNITIES; JURISDICTION; LAW.]

TRIFORIUM. It is defined by Ducange as a kind of gallery or arcade, which is carried all round a church, in order to furnish means of circulation about the church above the principal arcade. The same writer derives the name from the fact that in the earlier forms of the triforium the wall had a triple perforation between each pair of the great columns below. Structurally the triforium is the roof-space of a lean-to aisle. It is pronounced by Viollet-le-Duc (Dictionnaire de l'Architecture, s. v.) to be a tradition of the gallery (ambulatorium) of the first story of the Roman basilica. The name he says was introduced into the vocabulary of architecture by English archaeologists. Besides its purpose of a passage to which Ducange appears to limit the triforium, Viollet-le-Duc speaks of its being used for the congregation in the larger cathedrals on the occasion of a great solemnity.

[H. T. A.]

TRINITY, THE HOLY (IN ART). The early Christians shrank from representing God the Father in human form, much more from a pictorial representation of the Holy Trinity. The TRIANGLE was used to symbolize it, but even of this early examples are not common.

But the appearance of the three angels to Abraham (Gen. xviii.) was commonly regarded by the ancients as a manifestation of the Holy Trinity, and it is no doubt as such that it is represented in a mosaic of S. Maria Maggiore, a work of the 5th century (Ciampini, Vet. Monim. I. tab. li. 1).

In representations of the baptism of the Lord by St. John, the presence of the Father is frequently indicated by a hand appearing from a cloud, while the Holy Spirit appears as a dove [DOVE, p. 576]. Such a picture Paulinus describes in the church of St. Felix at Nola. The abbé Martigny sees also a representation of the Trinity in a mosaic of the 6th century in the church of SS. Cosmas and Damian (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. xvi.), where the Lord stands teaching; a hand from above suspends a crown over His head, while a dove, the head surrounded with rays, flies towards him. On a sarcophagus recently discovered, and now in the Lateran Museum, three bearded persons—probably representing the Trinity—are engaged in the creation of Eve. This is said to be of the latter half of the 4th century (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chréti. s. v. Trinité). [C.]

TRIODION (Τριώδιον). One of the ecclesiastical books of the Eastern church containing the offices from Septuagesima Sunday to Easter-Eve. It derives its name from the fact that while hymns in honour of our Lord, the B. V. M., and other saints had usually nine strophes (ὠδαί), during this period of the year they have only three. Hence lxx. Sunday is sometimes called simply "Triodium." A detailed and hostile examination of the contents of this book has been written by the Roman Catholic Leo Allatius de Lib. Eccles. Graec. Hamburgi, 1712; Neale (J. M.), Holy Eastern Church, Introd. p. 857. [F. E. W.]

TRIPHO. [ΤΡΥΦΗ.]

TRIPHONIA, wife of Decius Caesar, commemorated on Oct 18 (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Wand., Notker.). [C. H.]

TRIPODES, June 10, martyr with Basilides and Madales under Aurelian at Rome (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom.). [C. H.]

TRIPODIUM. This word occurs in a description of a Gospel procession in a passage quoted by Martene (de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. v. 2) from an ancient Tours ritual. It was probably a triangular stand, on which the Evangelistarium rested while the Gospel was being read.

[F. E. W.]

TRISAGION (Τρισάγιον). A hymn sung in the Eastern liturgies during the Little Entrance. It derives its name from the nature of its wording, "Ἅγιος ὁ Θεός, Ἅγιος ἰσχυρός, Ἅγιος ἀθάνατος ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς." It is also called τῷ τρισαγίῳ δοξολογία, and τριατὴ τοῦ ἀγαπασμοῦ τῆς θείας ὑμολογίας ἐκβόησις. It is said to have been first introduced into the Liturgy in the reign of the younger Theodosius (408–450), but it is probably much older. The legend of its being supernaturally communicated to the terror-stricken population of Constantinople during an earthquake in the episcopate of St. Proclus (A.D. 434) is preserved by many writers (Joan. Damasc. de Fid. Orthodox. iii. 10). Peter the Fuller at Antioch (ob. 477) added the words ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμᾶς. His successor neutralised this Patripassian addition by inserting Χριστὲ βασιλεῦ; but neither phrase obtained a permanent footing, although the emperor Anastasius (A.D. 491–518) tried to impose the acceptance of Peter's heretical formula which was adopted by the Syrian Monophysites (Bingham, Antiq. xiv. ii. 3; Robertson, (J. C.) Hist. of the Christian Church, i. 527, ed. 1864; Martene, de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. lib. iv. c. 23). In the West it forms part of the Impropria on Good Friday, where it is placed in some of the earliest extant service books of Troyes, Poitiers (ib.). The Εὐχὴ τοῦ Τρισαγίου was the prayer said by the priest (μυστικῶς, secrete), while the trisagion was being sung. For the Latin Sanctus or Tersanctus, with which the Trisagion is sometimes confused, see PREFACE, p. 1696.

[F. E. W.]

TRIUMPHAL ARCH. The name given to the large arch at the altar end of the nave in the early basilicas, separating it from the transept or from the sacarium. Of this arrangement we have examples in the basilicas of St. Paul's outside the walls, St. Praxedes, and in the original church of St. Peter's. The application of the name is also extended to the great arch of the apse. These arches are often supported with lofty columns of precious marbles, and have the spandrels and soffits richly decorated with mosaic pictures. [E. V.]

TROJANUS, bishop of Saintes, commemorated on Nov. 30 (Mart. Usuard., Adon.); Feb. 10 (Notker.). [C. H.]

TROPARION (τροπάριον). A generic name for all the short hymns which abound in the offices of the Eastern church (Neale, J. M., Eastern Church, Introd. pp. 832, 918).

[F. E. W.]

TROPHIMUS (1), Apr. 14, commemorated with Aristarchus and Pudens, "apostles" (Cod. Byzant.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.); Apr. 15 (Basil. Menol.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 257); Dec. 29 as bishop of Arles (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Wand., Rom.).

(2) Martyr with Thalaeus or Thalus under Diocletian, commemorated on Mar. 11 (Menol. Graec.; Mart. Rom.); Mar. 16 (Basil. Menol.).

(3) July 23, martyr with Theophilus under Diocletian (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.; Mart. Rom.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 264).

(4) Sept. 19, martyr with Serapion, or Sabbatius, and Dorymedon, under Probus (Cal. Byzant.; Basil. Menol.; Menol. Græc.; Mart. Rom.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 269). [C. H.]

TROYES, COUNCIL OF (TRECENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 429, from which Lupus, bishop of Troyes, and Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, were sent, at a request of the British church, on a mission into Great Britain to assist in confuting Pelagianism. (Mansi, iv. 543; Haddan and Stubbs, COUNCILS, etc. i. 16-18.) [E. S. Ff.]

TRUDO (ST. TRUYEN), presbyter and confessor at Hasbanium (Haspengaw), commemorated on Nov. 23 (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Wand., Rom.). [C. H.]

TRULLUS, a Latinised form of the low Greek τροῦλλα or τροῦλλος = θόλος, a hemispherical roof or dome. The covering of the cupola of the church of SS. Cosmas and Damian at Rome by pope Sergius I. is thus recorded in Anastasius (§ 163), "trullum ejusdem ecclesiae fuis chartis plumbeis cooperuit et munivit." The anonymous writer (de locis Hierosol. § 1) describes the church of the Holy Sepulchre as being στρογγυλοειδής, and as having τροῦλλας δύο. The Quinisext council has gained the name of "Trullan" or "in trullo" from having been held in a large domed hall in the imperial palace at Constantinople (cf. Ducange, Constantinop. Christiana, lib. ii. c. 4, § 20; lib. iii. c. 33). [CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCIL OF (34), p. 444.] Codinus gives the name "trulla" to the silk cap or turban worn by the chief imperial secretary (De Offic. c. iv. p. 22, ed. Bonn). [E. V.]

TRUMPET. The Egyptian monks appear to have used a trumpet as the call to prayer, probably in imitation of the trumpets by which the Israelites were summoned to their solemn assemblies. Thus Pachomius (Regula, c. 3) bids every monk to leave his cell as soon as he heard the sound of the trumpet summoning him to divine service. And the same usage is mentioned by Joannes Climacus (Scala Paradisi, Grad. 19) as prevailing at the convent on Mount Sinai in the 6th century. Perhaps the custom was then general in Egypt and Palestine (Bingham, Antiq. VIII. viii. 15; Martene, de Rit. Antiq. IV. ii. 9). [C.]

TRYPHO (TRIPHO) (1), Jan. 4, martyr in Africa with Aquilinus and others (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Adon., Notker., Rom.).

(2) Feb. 1, martyr in Phrygia under Decius (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Græc.). At Constantinople were two churches dedicated to him by Justinian and Justin II. respectively (Codinus, de Aedif. p. 5, p. 100, Bonn; Procop. de Aedif. lib. i. cap. 9, p. 201, Bonn; Du Cange, Cpolis. Christ. lib. iv. 140), and in 536 a monastery is mentioned (Mansi, viii. 907 c).

(3) July 3, martyr with ten others at Alexandria (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Rom.). [C. H.]

TULLENSE CONCILIUM. [TOUL.]

TUNICA. Any description of the tunica in its ordinary classical sense is foreign to our purpose; and its diminutive tunicella (whence the English tunicle, and less correctly tunacle) does not occur within our assigned period, its later special use being for the vestment of the subdeacon at the Eucharist (see e.g. Durandus, Rat. Div. Off. iii. 11. 3).

One or two instances, however, of the word tunica in early Christian writings must be noticed. The tunica was one of the articles of dress provided by the Rule of St. Benedict for his monks (c. 55, Patrol. lxxvi. 771). It seems to have been much the same as the Colobion (see the article), a tight-fitting garment, short-sleeved or sleeveless. Later on, we find the tunica as an article of sacerdotal dress. Here it is a kind of upper shirt, worn over the camisio, and of course under the casula. Two tunicas might be worn, an upper and an under one (Amalarius, de Div. Off. ii. 22; Patrol. cv. 1097). The word often occurs in the Vulgate as a translation of χιτὼν, and thus our Lord's "coat without seam" becomes tunica inconsutilis. For the legend in connexion with this, see e.g. Greg. Turon. de Gloria Martyrum, i. 8; Fredegarius, Chronicon, c. 11 (Patrol. lxxi. 712, 614).

TUNSIO PECTORIS. (1) St. Augustine more than once alludes to the beating of the breast by priests and people at the recital of the petition of the Lord's Prayer, "Forgive us our trespasses" [LORD'S PRAYER, p. 1058].

(2) It was also usual in some churches to beat the breast when the Agnus Dei was said (Martene, de Rit. Antiq. i. 158, ed. Venet. 1783). [C.]

TURBO, Jan. 17, martyr with Speusippus and his brothers (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

TURIANUS, bishop and confessor in Britany, commemorated on July 13 (Mart. Usuard., Rom.). [C. H.]

TURIN, COUNCIL OF (TAURINENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 400 or 401, assembled at the request of the bishops of France, for considering a difference between the metropolitans of Arles and Vienne respecting the primacy which each claimed. Eight canons are embodied in their synodical letter. (Mansi, iii. 859-66.)

[E. S. Ff.]

TURRIS, a pix of precious metal for the reservation of the consecrated bread in the Eucharist, formed in the shape of a tower, as other similar vessels were fashioned in the shape of a dove (DOVE, EUCHARISTIC). In the Greek church πύργος was used for the ciborium (Ducange, Const. Christ. iii. 62). Paulus Silentarius writes of St. Sophia (ii. 303), χρυσείης δ' ἐφύπερθε παναχράντοιο τραπέζης

ἀσπετος εὐρυκέλευθον ἐς ἥρα πύργος ἀνέστη.

Smaller towers were employed as reliquaries. Not unfrequently the dove and the tower were conjoined. Conical vessels surmounted by a dove appear in the 6th century mosaics at St. Apollinare in Classe at Ravenna (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. c. 12). There is also a doubtful example on a sarcophagus (Bottari, tav. xix.). The two are scarcely united in the catalogues of presents to the Roman churches in Anastasius; e.g. Hilary gave to the Lateran "turrim argenteam et columbam auream." Martene states that towers were hanging in his time in some of the Roman basilicas (de Ant. Ecol. Rit. lib. i.). Gregory of Tours has (de Glor. Martyr. i. 86) "accepta turre diaconus, in qua mysterium Domini corporis habebatur, ferre coepit ad ostium, ingressusque templum ut eam altari superponeret." The will of St. Aredius (Mabillon, Analect. tom. ii.) enumerates "turres," together with silver chalices and velvet coverings, among essential church furniture. The exposition of the ancient Gallican liturgy given by Martene (Anecd. tom. v. col. 95) says that the body of the Lord is carried in towers, "quia monumentum Domini in similitudinem turris fuit scissum in petra," a sufficiently far-fetched and unintelligible reason. Mabillon (Mus. Ital. tom. i. p. 389) furnishes the "benedictio calicis et patenae, et turris in qua celebraturi sumus sacrosancta mysteria," and supplies a reference to the will of St. Remigius desiring "turriculam et imaginatum calicem fabricari" (Flodoard. Hist. Rem. i. 18, ii. 6).

[E. V.]

TUSDNUM, THYSDRUS, or TISDRUS, COUNCIL OF (TUSDRENSE, or, as in the marginal references to Ferrandus, THUSDREITANUM CONCILIIUM), A.D. 417, inferred from the marginal references to canons 76 and 77 in Ferrandus, and from words in the preface to the council of Telepte, A.D. 418; but see that council.

[E. S. Ff.]

TYANA, COUNCIL OF (TYANENSE CONCILIIUM), A.D. 366, at which Eustathius of Sebaste, deposed at the synod of Melitena, sought to be restored to his see, which was done; but it was only followed by his relapse. (Mansi, iii. 393-8.)

[E. S. Ff.]

TYCHICUS, deacon, disciple of St. Paul, commemorated at Paphos on Apr. 29 (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Rom.); Dec. 9 with Sosthenes, Apollos, Cephas, and others (Basil. Menol.).

[C. H.]

TYPICON (τυπικόν) [=Lat. Ordinarium]. (a) One of the ecclesiastical books of the Eastern church containing the regulations and rubrics for the performance of divine service, including the Liturgy, the Hours, and other offices, with the variations to be observed on festal and ferial days throughout the year. Every church possessed its own typicum, but the edition most widely accepted was that drawn up by St. Saba for the monks at Jerusalem, and afterwards revised by Sophronius, patriarch of Constantinople and John of Damascus. A full description is given by L. Allatius (de Lib. Eccles. Graecorum Dissert. p. 1, Hamburg, 1722; Neale, J. M., Eastern Church, Introd. p. 848).

(b) Typica is also the name applied to verses selected from the Psalms to be sung on certain festivals observed in the Greek church in honour of our Lord and the B. V. M. called Despotica. Full directions are given in Goar's Euchologion, pp. 124, 186.

TYRANNIO, Feb. 20, martyr with Silvanus, Peleus, and others under Diocletian (Mart. Usuard., Notker., Rom.).

[C. H.]

TYRE, COUNCILS OF (TYRIA or TYRIENSIA CONCILIA), A.D. 335, A.D. 449, and A.D. 518). Of these the first has become notorious for having deposed St. Athanasius on charges that turned out utterly false; but that it could have been summoned for no other purpose than to condemn him must have been clear at the time from the fact that it was chiefly composed of his enemies. All the documents relating to it are given in Mansi (ii. 1123-54), and its proceedings told clearest in Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 353). At the second Ibas, bishop of Edessa, charged by four of his presbyters with Nestorianism, was, after a full hearing, acquitted. The documents relating to it were rehearsed at the ninth and tenth sessions of the council of Chalcedon (Mansi, vi. 497, and vii. 197 et seq.). At the third the orthodox acts of a council of Constantinople three months earlier were confirmed. The synodical letter of Epiphanius, bishop of Tyre, and the other bishops with him, was rehearsed at the fifth session of a later council of Constantinople under Mennas, A.D. 556. (Mansi, viii. 577 and 1073-82; comp. art. COUNCILS OF C.)

[E. S. Ff.]

TYRSUS. [THYRSUS.]

TZANGAE (also tsancae, zanchae, zancae, zangae; τζάνγαι, τζανγία), a kind of high boot, first apparently mentioned (with the spelling zanchae) in the letter of the emperor Gallienus (ob. A.D. 268) quoted by Trebellius Pollio, in which he enumerates a list of presents he had sent to Claudius, who afterwards succeeded him. Among these we find "Zanchas de nostris Parthis (al. Parthicas) paria tria" (Vita Claudii, c. 17; where see Salmasius' note). Thus their foreign origin may be inferred; and probably it is on this ground that the Theodosian Code prohibits their use in Rome. A law of Honorius, promulgated in A.D. 397, threatens those who wear tzangae and braccae, infra urbem, with confiscation of property and perpetual exile (lib. xiv. tit. 10, l. 2, where see Gothofredus's note). Two years later the same law was re-issued (ib. l. 3).

This prohibition refers to persons generally, inclusive that is of laics, but at a later time we find the prohibition specially laid down for monks. The first council of Orleans (A.D. 511) forbids the use of oraria [STOLE] and tzangae to monks (can. 20; Labbe, iv. 1408). Akin to this is the order of the first council of Mâcon (A.D. 581) that the clergy shall not use "calceamenta saecularia" (can. 5; Labbe, v. 968).*

The Greek words often occur in Byzantine writers for boots worn by persons of high rank, especially the emperor. Codinus Curopalata (de Officiis, c. 5) describes those worn by the emperor when walking or on state occasions (προκόψεις),^b adding that the workman who made them for the emperor was called τζάνγας, not τζανγάριος, as in the case of other people. See also Chronicon Paschale, p. 614, ed. Dindorf; Theophanes, vol. i. pp. 260, 484, 705, ed. Bekker.

The etymology of the word is quite unknown. Salmasius suggests that it is to be viewed as equivalent to a supposed form διάγχη, derived from άγχω, which seems most improbable.

* Ducange (Glossary, s.v.) cites a capitulary of Charlemagne ordering "ut clerici pampis ut tzangis vel armis non utantur." In the text, however, as given by Baluzius is read "pompis aut sagis" (Lib. vii. 398; vol. i. 1112); and, further, the whole of this part of the capitularies is considered by Pertz as spurious (Monumenta Germanica Historica: Legum, tom. ii. p. 127 in spiritis).

Sophocles (Greek Lex. of Roman and Byzantine periods, s. v.) derives it from the Teutonic word, which appears in English in the form shank. For further notices, see Ducange's Glossaries, s. vv. [R. S.]

UNCTION. I. OF PERSONS.

(1) Of Catechumens.—(a) The practice of anointing catechumens in Africa on their first reception appears to be implied by St. Augustine when he says, in reference to the anointing with clay in John ix. 6, "When He anointed him, He perchance made him a catechumen. . . . (Tract. 44, in S. Joan. Ev. § 2). A Roman council assigned to the age of Innocent (402–416) decides, in reply to a question of some Gallican bishops, that it is sufficient to use the "exorcised oil" once before the day of baptism, viz. "at the third scrutinium" (can. 8). In Spain, Isidore of Seville, 610, who distinguishes between the catechumens and competentes, says of the former, "These are first exorcised, then they receive the salt, and are anointed" (De Eccl. Off. ii. 20). So Ildefonsus of Toledo, 657 (De Cognit. Bapt. i. 29; see Hincmar, Epist. de Baptismo, 7; Hard. Conc. v. 417). There is no trace of this rite in any extant Ordo Scrutinii. See the collection in Assemanus, Codex Liturg. i. 53–104. Only one Ordo ad faciendum Catechumenum out of ten printed by Martene (De Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. i. 7) preserves this unction (Ord. 6); but there not the ears but the breast and shoulders are touched, as in the later pre-baptismal unction.

(b) In the East we early hear of an unction with exorcised oil immediately before baptism. Thus in the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 22): "Thou shalt first anoint him with holy oil and afterwards baptize him with water" (compare iii. 16). St. Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 350: "Being stripped, ye were anointed with exorcised oil from the hair on your head to the soles of your feet. After that ye were led by the hand to the holy font of baptism" (Catech. Myst. ii. 3, 4). So Chrysostom (Hom. vi. in Ep. ad Coloss. § 4); Pseudo-Dionysius (de Eccl. Hier. ii. 7); the Recognitions of Pseudo-Clement (iii. 67). This "anointing with holy oil" before the baptism is mentioned in an Egyptian story told by John Moschus, 630 (Pratum Spirit. 3).

In the Greek church there is still but one unction with exorcised oil, which takes place immediately before the baptism (Goar, Euchol. 354; Assem. ii. 141). With this agrees the Arabic office of the Greek Melchites (Assem. ii. 149). The Armenians have no such unction now. They had it, however, in the 8th century, as appears from a canon of John the Catholic printed by Mai, in which "the oil of catechumens" is expressly mentioned (Nova Collectio Script. Vet. x. ii. 304). In the Coptic church, when its constitutions were compiled, there was clearly but one unction with exorcised oil during the previous part of the baptismal office (Apost. Constit. Cop. ii. 46; Tattam's ed. 57; Boetticher's Gr. Tr. in Bunsen's Anal. Antenic. ii. 467); but in the Coptic order of baptism, as we have it, there are two (Assemani, Codex Liturg. i. 148, 163). The Abyssinians use the same order. There are two also in those of the Nestorians (ibid. i. 204; ii. 211), of the Syrians (i. 239, 254, 272, and ii. 224, 234, 240; ii. 253, 259, 285, 296, 302, 304), and of the Maronites (ii. 332, 349). In the former of these unctions the Syrian priest uses his thumb (i. 239; ii. 285).

We infer from the narrative of John Moschus that both sexes were anointed over the whole body (Prat. Spir. u. s.); and the rituals make no distinction when they prescribe the unction of the whole. See Goar, Euchol. Gr. 354; Ordo Nestor. Assem. ii. 211; Syr. 224 (Antioch.), 234 (Hieres.); 240, 259, 296, 304, 349 (Maron.). The Office of Philoxenus (240) expressly orders it in the case of females.

The unction of which we are now speaking appears to have been of much later introduction in the West. It is not noticed by the Spanish writers (Isidore, 610, De Bapt. in Eccl. Off. ii. 24; Ildefonse, 657, De Cogn. Bapt. i. 111, in Baluz. Misc. Sacra, tom. ii.). The earliest witness in Gaul is Caesarius, who died in 542: "All who are presented to the church for saving baptism receive both the chrism and the oil of benediction" (Serm. 22, § 2). Germanus of Paris, 555, mentions an unction that took place when the creed was given at baptism, but he is singular in speaking of it as an unction with proper chrism: "Catechumenis (sic) chrismate unguetur." This he expressly says was made with balsam (Epist. ii. Migne, lxxii. 96). The mistake in using chrism implies that the rite was quite recently adopted. We next read of this unction in the Besançon sacramentary found at Bobio, which is assigned to the 7th century (Mus. Ital. i. 324). Another probable Gallican witness is the author De Sacramentis: "Thou didst enter . . . Thou wast anointed as an athlete of Christ" (i. 2). This dates from about 745, if Ambrose of Cahors be the writer. It appears, however, in the Gelasian sacramentary (Liburg. Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 563), our copy of which is of the time of Charlemagne, and in some copies of the Gregorian of the 9th century (Murat. u. s. ii. 61; Pamel. Liturgicam. ii. 264; Gerbert. Monum. Vet. Liturg. Alem. i. 83; not in Ménard, Opp. Greg. Ben. iii. 70, or Rocca, Opp. Greg. 1615, v. 111). We find frequent mention of it by Gallican bishops using the Roman rites at the close of the 8th century; as Theodulf of Orleans, 794 (De Ord. Bapt. 10); Leidrad of Lyons, 798 (De Sacram. Bapt. 2); Jesse of Amiens (Epist. de Bapt. c. De Unct. Pect. &c.); Magnus of Sens (de Myst. Bapt. ad Car. Magn. printed in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. i. 17).

This unction, as we have already mentioned, is prescribed in some of the Roman Orders of Baptism. It appears also in the Ordo ad Scrutinium printed by Assem. Cod. Lit. i. 102, and the earliest Ordo Romanus by Mabillon, Mus. Ital. ii. 24. It is found in the modern office of Milan, but as it comes before the exorcism of the child and the giving of the salt, it is rather in the place of the ancient unction of the catechumen than of that of the competent. See Assem. u. s. ii. 44. As we might expect from the silence of Isidore and Ildefonsus, it is not prescribed in the ritual of the Goths of Spain (Miss. Mozar. Leslie, 182), nor do we find it in the Gothico-

Gallican missal (Liturg. Gall. 248), nor in the Old Gallican (ibid. 364). The only Gallican book in which it appears is the Romanizing sacramentary of Besançon (Mus. Ital. i. 324). We remark, too, that whereas a law of Carloman in 742 only directs presbyters to obtain "new chrism" from their bishop (Cap. 3, Capit. Reg. Fr. i. 147), Pepin, who desired conformity with Rome, in 744 orders them to apply to him for both "chrism and oil" (c. 4, ibid. 158).

For the formulae used at this unction we must refer generally to the collections of Martene and Assemani as above, contenting ourselves with that anciently employed at Rome: "I anoint thee with the oil of salvation in Jesus Christ our Lord unto life everlasting" (Assem. u. s. i. 102).

(2) The Unction of the Baptized with Chrism.—According to the older Coptic rite, when the deacon and the neophyte "came out of the water, the presbyter anointed him (the neophyte) with the oil of thanksgiving, saying, I anoint thee with an anointing, with holy oil, in the name of Jesus Christ" (Constit. Eccl. Aegypt. ii. 46, Boetticher's Gr. Tr. in Bunsen, Analecta Antenic. ii. 467, or Tatham's Apost. Constit. Copt. 59). This is the only authority, if we mistake not, for this practice in the East. An unction by the officiant immediately after baptism is mentioned by Latin writers, long before we hear from them of that which immediately preceded it. It is probable that pure oil was used (as evidently in Egypt, for in the canons above cited no distinction is made between the material exorcised and that blessed for chrism), the chrism being termed oil merely by several early writers who will be quoted; but ere long a compound (μύρον) was introduced from the East,* which soon appropriated to itself the name of "chrisma."

The first Latin witness to this unction is Tertullian, 192: "Having come out of the font, we are thoroughly anointed with a blessed unction, after the ancient rite, in which they were wont to be anointed unto the priesthood with oil from a horn" (De Bapt. 7; see Exod. xxix. 30, &c.). (comp. Adv. Marc. i. 14; De Resurr. 8). St. Cyprian: "It is also needful that the baptized person be anointed, that having received the chrism, i.e. the unction, he may be anointed of God, and have the grace of Christ. Moreover, that is a thank-offering (eucharistia: comp. the titles of the prayers over oil and μύρον in Constit. Apost. vii. 27, 42, 44, &c.), from which those who are baptized are anointed, viz. the oil hallowed on the altar" (Epist. 70). Compare De Mysteriorum, the work ascribed to St. Ambrose (v. 29); Jerome (Dial. adv. Lucif. § 9); Augustine (de Bapt. Don. v. 20, § 23; Serm. 324; de Trin. xv. 22, § 46); Pseudo-Innocent of Rome (Epist. i. 3); Isidore of Seville (de Eccl. Off. ii. 25); Ildefonsus of Toledo (de Cogn. Bapt. i. 123); Caesarius (d. 542) (Serm. 22, § 2); Fortunatus (living in 600) (i. v. 5; Opp. ed. 1786); Pseudo-Ambrose (de Sacram. iii. 2, § 8); Theodulph (de Ord. Bapt. 15); Leidrad (de Sacram. Bapt. 7); Jesse (Epist. ad Sacerd.

c. De unctione Capitis); Magnus (Martene u. s. i. i. 17; sim. Anon. Tract. de Sac. Bapt. ibid.); Alcuin (Ep. 90 ad Lugd. and De Bapt. Cuern. ad Oduin. Opusc. 4); Smaragdus (Coll. in Epist. in Sabb. Pentec. u. s. 321). From Aquileia we have the testimony of Maxentius (Collect. Dicta app. Epist. de Signif. Rit. Bapt. § 8); from Metz, of Amalarius the chor-episcopus (de Eccl. Off. i. 27); from Treves of Amalarius the archbishop (de Sac. Bapt. u. s. 897); from Mentz, of Rabanus Maurus (de Instit. Cler. i. 28); from Rome, of John the deacon (Epist. ad Senar. 6, u. s.).

This unction, as we have learnt from Theodulph, was on the head. So other authorities; Sacram. Gelas. in Murat. i. 570, "on the brain;" Greg. ii. 65; Codex Elig. Greg. in Opp. Gr. iii. 73, ed. Ben., and Cod. Vatic. Rocca Opp. Gr. v. 111, ed. 1615, "on the crown;" a Gregorian Order for the Sick, Mur. ii. 264, Assem. ii. 10; the Milanese Office, "the crown" (Ass. ii. 47). The Besançon Sacramentary (ibid. 42) is peculiar in having "in frontes ejus." This unction was with the thumbs. See the Ordo Ambros. Assem. u. s. 47; Sacram. Gellon. ibid. 54; Remig. 59; Codex Elig. Greg. u. s.; Cod. Vat. u. s.; &c.

(3) Oil of Chrism (μύρον) used at Confirmation.—An unction, generally on the forehead, distinct from the unction of the head which immediately followed baptism, came to be practised in the church. This is not mentioned by the earlier Latin writers who speak of the imposition of hands. See Tertullian, de Baptismo, viii.; Cyprian, Epist. 72 ad Steph. and the council of Carthage, A.D. 256, cc. 5, 24; that of Elvira, about 300, can. 38 (to be inferred also from 57), the author De Haeret. Bapt. in App. ad Opera Cypr. 23, ed. 1690. The date of Pseudo-Innocent is not known, but as we certainly hear of the rite in Italy in the 5th century we may give his testimony here. His statement is that presbyters ought not to sign the forehead of the baptized with the oil of chrism, "for that is the privilege of bishops only, when they give, the Holy Ghost" (Epist. Inn. i. § 3). Cassiodorus, 514: "Our forehead has been anointed with the unction of the sacred chrism" (Comm. in Ps. cxxxviii. v. 2, E.V.). Fortunatus, 560, is the first Gallican writer who is a contemporary witness to the rite in France; but we may infer from a passage in the remains of St. Patrick, who received Gallican consecration and was closely connected with the church in Gaul, that it was practised there in the middle of the 5th century. Some of his Irish neophytes were murdered by Welsh invaders, "while still in their white robes, the day after they had been anointed with chrism, and while it was yet visible on their foreheads" (Epistle to Coroticus, Olden's tr. 93). The frontal chrismation at confirmation is mentioned by Fortunatus in a hymn (Opera, i. ii. 9). Gregory of Tours, 573, says that Chlodoveus was baptized (in 496), and "anointed with the sacred chrism, with the sign of the cross of Christ" (Hist. Franc. ii. 31). In the 6th century the rite was probably universal in the West. The gift of the Holy Ghost is also connected with the imposition of hands and unction of chrism by Ildefonso of Toledo, 657 (De Cogn. Bapt. i. 128-131). Later witnesses towards the close of our period and beyond it are Theodulf (de Ord. Bapt. 17); Leidrad (de Bapt. 7); Jesse (de Bapt. c. De Conf. Episc.); Amalarius of Metz (de Eccl. Off. i. 27); Rabanus Maurus (de Instit. Cler. i. 30).

In France the general adoption of this practice met with a check from the council of Orange in 441: "Inter nos placuit semel chrismari."^c If the chrism had been from any necessary cause omitted at baptism, the bishop was to be informed that he might supply the omission "Nam inter quoslibet (ul. nos) chrismatis ipsius non nisi una benedictio est; non ut praejudicamus quicquam (ul. dico), sed ut non necessaria habeatur repetita chrismatio" (can. 2). This decree was adopted by the council of Arles in 452 (can. 127). The testimonies of Fortunatus of Poitiers and Gregory of Tours shew that the rule of Orange did not prevail over France. That it obtained largely and survived to the time of Charlemagne may be inferred from the silence of certain authors, who speak only of the imposition of hands in their description of confirmation. Thus Alcuin, after an account of the rites of baptism: "Novissime per impositionem manus a summo sacerdote septiformis gratiae Spiritum accipit" (Epist. 90; sim. De Bapt. Cuernem. ad Oduin.). So Magnus of Sens, using here the same words as Alcuin, but adding much of his own (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. 17), and an anonymous copier of Alcuin (ibid.).

We see from several of the foregoing authorities that the forehead was anointed at confirmation. This was done both in the East and West, but in the East other parts are anointed also; as the eyes, nostrils, ears, breast, hands, and feet among the Greeks (Goar, Euchol. 355, 6), or, as in some MSS., the eyes, nostrils, and ears only (359, 360); one omits the feet only (362); another omits the hands and feet, but prescribes an unction of the back (368). Cyril of Jerusalem mentions the forehead, ears, nostrils, and breast (Catech. Myst. iii. 3). The Copts and Abyssinians anoint the forehead, eyes, mouth, ears, hand, breast, knees, feet (the soles), back, arms, and shoulders (Assem. iii. 83;—compare a purely Abyssinian order, 111); the Armenians the forehead, ears, eyes, nostrils, mouth, hands (together), breast, shoulder, feet, shoulder-blades, saying a proper sentence over each (ibid. 119; see Vartanes, Resp. 2 in Mai, Script. Vet. Nor. Coll. x. ii. 271). Most of the Syro-Jacobite orders prescribe an unction of the whole body in both sexes, but they all begin with the forehead (154, 160, 163, 169, 175, 184); one (148) mentions the forehead and

^c A couplet from an inscription to the memory of a bishop named Mareas found in a church in Rome (Gruter, Corpus Inscript. 1176) has been quoted in the same sense:—

"Tuque sacerdotes docuisti chrismate sancto Tangere bis nullum iudice posse Deo."

It is, however, difficult to believe that an unsuccessful attempt to introduce the Gallican restriction into the suburbicarian dioceses would have been recorded with approbation in Rome itself; and as the context speaks of conflict with misbelievers, we rather understand that Mareas maintained the Roman rule not to give unction to heretics who joined the church. See Morinus, de Sacram. Poenit. ix. 10.

windpipe only. The Maronite bishop anoints the forehead, the priest the head only (187). The Melchites, the forehead, ears, hands, feet, breast, shoulders, nostrils, palms, knees, legs, back (227). The apostolic imposition of hands is lost in every Syrian order. On the other hand the Nestorian books do not prescribe the unction at all (ibid. 138; Badger, Nestorians, ii. 209); from which we infer that this unction was not universal when they left the church in 451. When this rite found its way into the West the frontal unction only was adopted, probably because none other was then practised, at least over the greater part of the East. See Sacram. Gelus. Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. i. 571; Sacram. Gregor. Codd. Elig. in Opp. Greg. iii. 74, ed. Ben., Col. Vat. u. s. 112; Pontif. Egbert; Surtees Soc. no. 27, p. 7; &c.

The Romans used the thumb in this unction (Sacram. Greg. Codd. Elig. Vat. u. s.), as they and the United Maronites (Assem. iii. 187) do now. In theory the minister of this rite was the bishop. In the West it is expressly confined to him by the author of the Epistle to Decentius (Epp. Innoc. I. i. 3), Gregory I. (Ep. iii. 9), the Council of Seville 619 (can. 7), Ildefonso of Toledo 657 (De Cognit. Bapt. i. 131); Theodore of Canterbury (Poenitentiale, iii. 8, in Stubbs and Haddan's Councils, iii. 193), Theodulf of Orleans (de Ord. Bapt. 17), &c.; and recognised as his proper office by all, as e. g. Cornelius, A.D. 251 (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 43), St. Jerome (c. Lucif. 4), Isidore of Seville (De Eccl. Off. ii. 26), Jesse of Amiens (u. s.), &c. See also the Sacramentaries.

Nevertheless some liberty was allowed even at Rome. In Sardinia it had been the custom for priests to anoint the head after baptism. Gregory I. forbade this, but afterwards, in 593, modified his prohibition which had given offence: "We acted indeed according to the old custom of the church, but if any are really distressed about this matter, where bishops are wanting, we permit presbyters also duly to touch the baptized on their foreheads with the chrism" (Epist. iii. 26). In Spain the council of Toledo, so early as 400, had allowed the presbyter to do this in the bishop's absence; and even before him, if he commanded it (can. 20). The latter liberty is also given by a canon in the collection of Martin of Braga, A.D. 569 (c. 52). In France, as we have seen above, the unction by the bishop was from the 5th century to the 9th considered a needless repetition of that by the priest immediately after baptism. Pseudo-Baeda (in Psalmo 26 v. 1, Comment.) asserts that the unction "quae per manuum impositionem ab episcopis" is the same with that last mentioned, adding "propter arrogantiam tamen non concessa est singulis sacerdotibus sicut et multa alia" (Baed. Opp. viii. 558, ed. 1563). That one of the chrismations was originally regarded as a substitute for the other, or otherwise connected with it, may also be inferred from the tradition that Sylvester, A.D. 314, permitted priests to use the chrism after baptism, lest the person should die without any chrismation (Anastas. Biblioth. Vit. Pont. 34).

In the East, also, the bishop was considered the proper minister of this unction (see Dionys. Hier. Eccl. iv. 10; Maximus, Scholia in H. E. ii. 78); but there the liberty which Gregory I. permitted in a special case was extended to all priests. Hilary the Deacon, 351 (Comm. in Epist. ad Eph. iv. 11), tells us that "among the Egyptians presbyters give the seal if a bishop be not present" (comp. MS. Colbert, cf. Quaest. Vet. et Nov. Test. 101, probably by the same writer). In the Apostolical Constitutions the priest, no less than the bishop is commanded, to "seal with μύρον" after baptizing (vii. 22). In the 9th century Photius affirms the right of priests to give the unction of confirmation as freely as to baptize (Epist. Encycl. i. 13, § 7). Gabriel of Philadelphia, while aware that this was at first the privilege of bishops, says that "the Eastern Church considerably permits it not to bishops only, but to presbyters also after the sacred rite of baptism" (in Assen. Cod. Liturg. iii. lxxxi.). The bishop is, however, in every case the real minister of the rite, because the chrism which the priest applies has been consecrated by him [CHRISM]. To the authorities there given add Damasus, Epist. 5; Conc. Vasense, A.D. 442, can. 3; Gelasius, 494, Ep. ad Episc. Lucan. 4; Conc. Hispal. 619, cap. 7; Synod. Regiat. 850, can. 7; Conc. Wormat. 868, can. 2.

Information respecting the several unctions of which we have treated above, and the oils used in them, may be found in the following books and many others. Jos. Vicecomes, *de Ant. Bapt. (4) Unction of Heretics.—Heretics whose baptism was considered invalid, on whatever grounds, were baptized and confirmed on their admission into the church. This was ruled unanimously by the council of Carthage, A.D. 256, in the case of heretics whose baptism was afterwards allowed by the church. See BAPTISM, ITERATION OF, p. 172.

There were some, however, whose baptism was admitted, but who were not confirmed. The Novatians "did not confer the most holy chrism on those whom they baptized; on which account," says Theodoret, "the most highly esteemed fathers gave command to anoint those who are joined to the church from this heresy" (Haer. Fabul. iii. 5).

Those whose baptism and confirmation were considered valid were of two classes; i. those who had received those rites in the church, before they lapsed into heresy; and ii. those who had received them from heretics.

i. The former were regarded as penitents (HERESY, 4, i. p. 768; PENITENCE), and readmitted with the simple laying of hands, as in the absolution of other penitents (Conc. Carth. 256, cc. 4 and 22). So Cyprian (Epist. 71, ad Quint.; Ep. 74, ad Pomp. in fine). Even those who had been rebaptized by heretics were thus readmitted as penitents (Leo. I. Epist. 159, ad Nicet. c. 6, ed. Ballerin. Comp. Innocent I.

A.D. 402, Ep. 18 ad Alex. § 3; Vigilius, 538, Ep. ii. § 3).

ii. A different language was held with regard to those converts who had been baptized by heretics only. These from the time of St. Augustine, supposing that the proper matter and right form had been employed, were received at first with imposition of the hand simply (see Stephen in Cyprian Epist. 74; De Bapt. Haeret. in App. ad Opp. Cypr.; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 2; Leo M. Ep. 166 ad Neon. 2, Ep. 167 ad Rust. Resp. 18), afterwards with imposition and unction. The earliest witness to the change is the council of Laodicea, which some place so early as 314; others so late as 372. This council directs that Novatians, Photinians, and Quartodecimans joining the church, "having learnt thoroughly the symbols of the faith and been anointed with the holy chrism, shall thus communicate of the holy mystery" (can. 7). So St. Basil directs the Cathari, Encratites, Aquarii, and Apotactites to be "anointed by the faithful and so approach the mysteries" (Ep. ad Amphil. can. 1). Pseudo-Justin: "Let the fall of the heretic who comes to the orthodox faith be remedied, as to his heterodoxy by a change of mind, as to his baptism by the unction of the holy μύρον, as to his ordination by the imposition of hands" (Quaest. et Resp. ad Orthod. R. 14). The council of Constantinople, 381, decreed that Eunomians, Montanists, and Sabellians should after a long catechumenate be rebaptized, because it regarded their baptisms as defective in form; but it only required that Arians, Macedonians, Sabbatians and other Novatians, Quartodecimans and Apollinarians, should be "first sealed or anointed with the holy μύρον, on the forehead and eyes, and nostrils and mouth and ears" (can. 7). The council adds, "And while sealing them we say, The seal of the gift of the Holy Ghost,"—thus making it an act of confirmation. Converts from these five sects are mentioned as requiring the unction only by Timotheus C. P. (Epist. de Recept. Haeret. in Cotel. Eccles. Graec. Monum. iii. 392-396), and Theodorus Studita (Epist. ad Naukrat. i. 40). The council in Trullo, A.D. 691, reaffirmed the decree of 381, only adding the Pauliani to the number of those who were to be rebaptized (can. 95). See also the Arabic Nicene canon in the article on HERESY, 4, ii. (p. 768), and the Eastern form of admission (ibid. iv. p. 769).

It is probable that this unction was never introduced at Rome; for we find Gregory I. saying in 600, "the West restores Arians by the laying on of the hand, but the East by the unction of the holy chrism, on their entrance into the holy Catholic church." Some, he tells us, as the Monophysites, were received on a profession of faith only (Epist. ix. 61). In Gaul, however, this rite had already been observed for more than a century and a half. For the council of Orange in 441 says, "It is decreed that heretics in danger of death and desiring to become Catholics be sealed by the presbyters with chrism and benediction (i.e. imposition of hands), if the bishop be not present" (can. 1). The council of Arles, 452, ordered Photinians or Paulianists to be baptized "secundum patrum (Conc. Nic. 19, &c.) statuta"; but Bonosiani (a subdivision of the same sect), because they baptized in the name of the Trinity, were to be received into the church "with chrism and imposition of the hand" (cann. 16, 17). Faustus of Rhegium, 475 (De Grat. Dei et Lib. Arb. i. 15), taught that one thus baptized was to be "judged to be so washed by the operation of grace, that he need only to be clothed with the benediction of the chrism." The author De Ecclesiasticis Dogmaticis (22 al. 52), supposed to be Gennadius of Marseilles, 495, says that all who have been baptized in due form and matter by heretics should, if able to answer for themselves, "being already purged by the soundness of their faith, be confirmed by imposition of the hand;" but that those who cannot answer for themselves should be presented by sponsors as at baptism, "and so being fortified by imposition of the hand and the chrism, be admitted to the mysteries of the Eucharist." The Gallican council of Epaone, A.D. 517: "We require the presbyters for the safety of souls, which we desire in all, to assist with the chrism heretics who are given over and confined to bed, if they seek a sudden conversion. Which let all desiring to turn know that they must, if in health, seek from the bishop" (can. 16). Examples of such chrismation in France are found in Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. i. 31; 34; iv. 27, 28). The same discipline prevailed in Spain. "Heretics," says Isidore, "if they are proved to have received baptism in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, are not to be baptized a second time, but are to be purged by chrism only and imposition of the hand" (De Eccl. Off. ii. 24). The council of Seville in 619 says that it is not lawful for presbyters to sign the forehead of the baptized with chrism (can. 7). For instances of the practice see Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 39; ix. 15; and Reccared at the council of Toledo, 589 (Conc. Hard. iii. 471). In the 9th century we hear of the same rule from Walafrid Strabo (de Reb. Eccl. 26).

(5) Uction of the Sick.—The Apostles anointed many for whose recovery they prayed (St. Mark vi. 13), and St. James (v. 14, 15) recommends the same practice to "the elders of the church." It was followed by very many, both laymen and women, in every part of the church. E.g. a female saint, Eugenia, is said to have healed a sick woman by anointing her with oil (Vita, 11, in Rosweyde, 343). We need not stop to prove this at length; as it will be conceded that they who could do the greater, viz. bless the oil (of which see many instances in OIL, USES OF (3), p. 1455, could certainly do the less, viz. apply it when blessed. The oil blessed by St. Monegund on her death-bed was necessarily used by others. It is more important to shew that this liberty remained, when the oil was no longer blessed by laymen and women. Thus Pseudo-Innocent (Ep. ad Decent. § 8): "Being made by the bishop it is lawful, not for priests only, but for all Christians to use it in anointing in their own need, or that of their friends." Caesarius of Arles, 502: "Let him who is sick receive the body and blood of Christ, and then let him anoint his body" (Serm. 66, § 3). In an epidemic he recommends a person to "anoint both himself and family with blessed oil" (Serm. 89, § 5). St. Eligius, 640: "Let him faithfully seek the blessed oil from the church, wherewith to anoint his body in the name of Christ" (De Rect. Cathol. Convers. 5). This liberty is recognised in an old pontifical of Rouen, in which the bishop is said to "bless the oil for the sick and for the people" (Note 282 in Lib. Sacram. Gregor. Ménard). Notices of the rite in the 8th and 9th centuries sometimes leave it uncertain whether the priest anoints the sick himself, though the unction and communion are both mentioned. E.g. Theodulf of Orleans, 794: "When the sick man shall have been anointed, with prayers, &c., then let the priest give him the peace and communicate him" (Capitulare ii. in Baluz.; Miscell. ii. 104, ed. Mansi). With this compare Conc. Aquisgr. 836 (De Vita Infer. Ord. c. 5); Conc. Mogunt. 847, can. 26; Herard. Turon. 858, cap. 21; Isaac Lingon. 859, Canones, i. 23; Capit. Reg. Franc. vi. 75; the articles of visitation (n. 18) preserved by Regino (De Discipl. Eccl. p. 23, ed. Baluz.); "Bede" cited ibid. i. 119; &c. Not till the middle of the 9th century, if I mistake not, do we meet with any express injunction to the priest to perform the unction himself. Then Hincmar, 852, says to his clergy, "Let him himself both anoint them with the sacred oil and communicate them" (Capit. 5, Labb. Conc. viii. 578). Riculfus of Soissons, 889: "It is the duty of presbyters to anoint their sick with holy oil" (c. 10, ibid. ix. 419). So Leo iv. 847 (De Cura Pastoralis, ib. viii. 34), and Rutherius of Verona after him, 928 (Synodica, ib. ix. 1271): "Oleo sancto inungite et propria manu communicate", and the three Admonitiones Synodales printed by Baluze in App. to Regino (De Discipl. Eccles. 603, 608, 612).

The restraint of the unction to the priest had momentous consequences. The original intention of it in relation to the healing of the body was practically forgotten, and the rite came to be regarded as part of a Christian's immediate preparation for death. Hence, in the 12th century, it acquired the name of the last unction, "unctio extrema," (Peter Lomb. Sentent. iv. 23), i.e. as the Catechism of Trent asserts (P. 2, De Ext. Uinct. 3), the last of those which a man received from the church. In the 13th it was placed by schoolmen among the seven rites to which they then limited the application of the term "sacrament" (Thomas Aquin. Summa, suppl. ad P. iii. qu. 29). See Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. vii. 1, § 2; Notitia Eucharistica, 1011, 2nd ed.

The order in which the sick were anointed and communicated was changed more than once. The earliest extant notices (Conc. Turon. in Regino, i. 116; Caesarius, u.s.; Eligius, u.s.; &c.) put the communion before the unction. This is what we might expect; for when recovery from sickness was the object of the unction, the sufferer would naturally prepare for it by communicating. On the other hand, when they had recourse to it only at the supposed approach of death, it was put at first before the communion, because that had always been regarded as the proper VIATICUM, the last preparation for departure. This was the common order in the 9th and 10th centuries, as we learn from "Bede" in Regino, Leo, Hincmar, &c. already quoted, and from nearly every Ordo Ungendi in Martene, de Ant. Rit. Eccl. i. vii. 4. See also the first Admonitio Synodalis cited above. At length, however, extrema unctio was supposed to mean unctio in extremis, and men returned to the original order from a new motive. As unction is still notoriously the last rite of the dying, we need give no proof of this; but we may mention, as an interesting illustration, that the clauses ordering unction and communion in the first form of the Admonitio Synodalis (above) are in the two later inverted with a view to this change. Their reading is, "Propria manu communicet, et oleo sacro inungat" (Regino, 608, 612). The earliest ordo given by Martene which follows this rule is an Amiens Pontifical not 600 years old (I. vii. 4 ord. 27). It was never adopted in the Church of England. An early example occurs in the life of St. Hildegund of the 12th century, "Corpore Dominico sibi dato, sancto eam inungi fecit oleo" (Vita, v. 30; Bolland. Apr. 20).

It has been common both in the East and West for more than one priest to be present at this rite; but there is no evidence that the Greeks or Orientals observed such a custom before the 9th century. See Leo Allatius, de Consensu utriusque Ecclesiae, iii. 16, § 15; Arcudius, de Concord. Eccl. Occ. et Or. iv. 3). In the West, however, examples occur from an early period. E.g. St. Clotilda, 554, was "secundum Apostolum inuncta sacerdotibus" (Acta Chrotildis, iii. § 19, Boll. June 3). Several were present at the unction of St. Hunegund, A.D. 690 (Vita, iii. 20, Boll. Aug. 25). Theodulf requires three (u.s.). In 850 the synod of Ticino ordered that "the presbyter of the place . . . should invite the neighbouring presbyters also" (Syn. Regiatic. can. 8); and traces of the custom are found in some of the ancient offices (Mart. u.s. Ord. 13, "unus ex sacerdotibus"; Ord. 14, "singuli sacerdotes").

The Greeks in the 8th century made only three crosses with the oil which they "poured out of the ampulla crosswise on the head and dress and whole body of the sick man" (Theodulf, u.s.). The French bishop who tells us this also informs us that the Latin practice was to anoint the eyebrows, ears, nostrils, lips, the back of the hands, the feet, throat, breast, neck, shoulder-blades, navel, or the seat of pain (ib.). The same details are given in an old English pontifical of about A.D. 800 (MS. Genmet, Mart. u.s. Ord. 1), and in that of Prudentius of Troyes, 850 (Ord. 3); only the former omits the throat, the latter the breast. A cross was made with the oil on every part.

We need hardly mention that a public penitent could not be anointed in sickness until he had been "reconciled by the communion of the body and blood of Christ" (Conc. Regiatic. can. 8).

On Maundy Thursday, while the other oils were provided beforehand by the clergy, offerings of oil for the sick were brought by the people, who probably, as we infer from their use of it, took much of it home with them after it had been blessed. The earliest Ordo Romanus, about 730, says, "Benedicitur oleum quod populus offert" (§ 30, Mus. Ital. ii. 20). The Gelasian Sacramentary has "Benedictio olei ad populum" (Liturg. Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 555). The Gregorian: "Ampullae quas offerunt populi" (ibid. ii. 55).

On some points connected with this subject we are at a disadvantage in consulting Roman Catholic authors, as they draw no clear line between the primitive use of oil with prayer and the medieval priestly rite; but we may mention Edm. Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 7 in several editions; Jo. Launoïus, de Sacram. Uctionis Infirmorum, Par. 1673; J. C. Trombellius, Tract. de Sacram. Extr. Uct. Bonon. 1776; and on the other side, Jo. Dallaeus, de Extrema, ut vocant, Uctione, Genev. 1659.

II. UNCTION OF THINGS.—Pseudo-Dionysius, perhaps about 520, tells us that altars were consecrated by the affusion of μύρον (Hier. Eccl. iv. iii. 12). An Armenian Catholicus of the 8th century says of the chrism, "The priest ought to receive this oil from the bishops, and with it anoint altars, temples and churches" (Joannis can. 9; Mai, Nova Coll. Script. x. ii. 304). The Coptic priest signs the new paten, chalice, and SPOON, and the black corporal as well as the altar itself with chrism when he consecrates them. See the Benedictions in Renaud. Liturg. Orient. i. 54, 55. In the Syrian rite an altar is consecrated by a bishop only, who "signs the slab by anointing it with chrism in which he dips his thumb, drawing it over the same lines which he had before described in the form of a cross, and that he does thrice, reciting meanwhile versicles from the psalms, hymns, and responsories." After which he says, "This altar set before us hath been signed, anointed, and sealed in the Name," &c. (ibid. ii. 57). The practice has descended to the modern Greeks, whose office directs the bishop at the dedication of a church to pour μύρον on the slab, and cross it thrice with the same, and then beginning at the crosses to anoint the whole upper surface. The pillars and sides of the altar are then thrice crossed with chrism. A cross is also made with it on every column and pilaster in the church (Goar. Euch. 837-8). The chrism is also used at the consecration of Antimensia before as well as after being mixed with relics and ceromastic (ibid. 648). We hear of the same use of oil in the West from the latter part of the 5th century downward, if indeed the Homily on the 4th Sunday after Pentecost ascribed to Eusebius Emisenus be really written by Faustus of Rhegium, who is said to have assumed that name, A.D. 472; for there we read, "By oil a church is hallowed" (Hom. Euseb. E. 151; Par. 1554). The council of Agde, 506, says, "It is decreed that altars be hallowed not only by the unction of chrism, but also by a sacerdotal (i.e. episcopal) benediction" (can. 14). The council of Epaone, 517: "Alitaria nisi lapidea chrisimatis unguine non sacrentur" (can. 26). Yet the Frankish missal, of about 560, only orders a sprinkling with wine and water, mixed (Lit. Rom. Vet. Murat. ii. 677). The canon of Epaone was adopted by Egbert of York, A.D. 732-766 (can. 51; Hard. Conc. iii. 1966). The rite is not, however, mentioned by the council of Cealchythe, 816, when it prescribes the mode of dedicating a church. In Spain, Isidore of Seville, about 630, says, "Ad episcopum pertinet basilicarum consecratio, unctio altaris, confectio chrisimatis" (Ad Leudef. § 10). It was thought to be done in the case of the altar in imitation of Jacob (Gen. xxviii. 18, xxxv. 14). The council of Aix la Chapelle, in 836, after citing his action, says, "The Christian religion, taking example from the ancient tradition of the fathers, . . . erects altars, and pours oil on them, and anoints them with the most holy chrism, and from the acts and vows of the aforesaid Jacob sings a melody to Christ" (lib. iii. cap. 23). Compare Rabanus Maurus de Instit. Cleric. ii. 45, and Walafr. Strabo, de Reb. Eccl. 9. This notion is preserved in the old English pontificals. See Remigius of Auxerre (de Dedic. Eccles. 8) on the question, "Quid signetur in varia Unctione Altaris?" After the unction of the altar, the bishop going round the church signs the walls with chrism, using his thumb (Pontif. Egberti Ebor. in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. ii. 13, Ord. 2). Comp. the English pontifical preserved at Jumièges (ibid. Ord. 3), that of Dunstan (Ord. 4), and the Gallican Pontificals of Rheims, Noyon (Ordd. 5, 6), &c. Egbert gives a form for consecrating a paten and chalice with unction (Mart. u. s., but at length in the Surtees Society's edition, p. 47. Comp. Mart. Ordd. 1, 3, 4, &c.). The blessing of the chalice follows, and here Dunstan only of those whom we have cited orders it to be anointed. Bells were also anointed with chrism when blessed (Surt. Soc. 118; Mart. u. s. Ord. 3).

USURY. In the early church, the austere morality inculcated by its teachers and the comparative seclusion of its members from intercourse with the world and participation in the more equivocal methods of acquiring wealth, combined to cause the calling of the usurer, and even the occasional lending of money for purposes of gain (whether to fellow Christians or to strangers), alike to be regarded as unlawful. Such procedure, whether systematic or exceptional, was accordingly altogether condemned; passages such as Exod. xxii. 24; Levit. xxv. 36, 37; Deut. xxiii. 20, 21; Neh. v. 7, 10, 11; Ps. xiv. 4, 5; liv. 12; St. Luke, vi. 34, 35; &c., being regarded as decisive of the Scriptural teaching on the subject. This view continued, for the most part, to prevail long after the 8th century. The schoolmen unanimously raised their voice against usury in any form (Bonaventura, ad Sent. iv. xv. 2, art. 2, quaest. 1, 4; Aquinas, Summa, II. ii. 78, art. 1). The passage in the New Testament (Luke xix. 23) which appears to countenance the practice was explained away by Aquinas by supposing that money as referred to in this parable is to be understood only in a metaphorical and spiritual sense. The Reformers (Luther, Melancthon, &c.) also held that the teaching of the Mosaic law left no doubt as to the obligations of Christians in this matter.

The practice of usury under the Empire offered however peculiar temptations to the clergy, from the fact that it required no previous acquaintance with any craft and but little knowledge of commercial affairs. On the other hand, it was liable to abuse which involved great moral wrong: the legal rate of interest was fixed at twelve per cent.—"usura centesima,"—but in the time of

* I.e. one per cent. per month. This law was re-enacted by Constantine only a month before the council of Nicaea, a fact which, as Professor Funk observes, shews that the prohibition of the church could have had but very partial effect (Cod. Theod. I. ii. 23; Funk, Gesch. des Kirchlichen Zinsverbotes, p. 9).

Chrysostom there were many who demanded as much as fifty. He denounces this as καὶνὰ γένη τόκων, καὶ οὐδὲ τοῖς ἑλλήνων νόμοις νενομισμένα,—“a new rate of interest unauthorised even by the laws of the pagans,” and yet, he says, the usurer will exact it from a poor man who has a wife and children and gets his living by thrashing corn or treading the wine-press (in Matth. Hom. li.; Migne, Patrol. Græc. lviii. 588).

Apollonius (Euseb. E. H. v. 18) enumerates the lending of money at interest as one among other unlawful practices indulged in by the teachers of the Cataphrygians. Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. ii. 18) says, “the law” (i.e. the Mosaic law) “forbids thee to lend money at interest to thy brother;” and he interprets “brother” as including ὅς ἂν ὁμόφυλος ᾖ, ὁμογνώμων τε καὶ τοῦ αὐτοῦ λόγου κεκοινωνηκώς (Migne, ib. viii. 171). Tertullian quotes Ezekiel (xviii. 8), and says that the prohibition of the Old Testament is ratified by that of the New (adv. Marcion. iv. 17). Cyprian (Testim. iii. 48) cites the same passage, and also Ps. xiv. and Deut. xxiii. 20. Commodianus (Instruct. adv. Gent. Deos. c. 65) declares that the alms of the usurer find no favour in God’s sight, even though he bestow in charity twice the amount that the legal rate of interest would enable him to give,—“duplicem centesima nummum” (Migne, v. 251). Lactantius (Dir. Inst. vi. 18) classes it as one of the “mandata Dei” that no man shall receive interest for money lent to another who is in necessity, otherwise, he says, the kindly act loses its value, and the lender is as one who profits by his neighbour’s trouble, —“quod qui facit insidiatur quomodo, ut ex aliorum necessitate praedetur” (ib. vi. 699).

But while it is not unreasonable to suppose that in the practice of the austere morality inculcated by the early church these views found corresponding observance among a certain minority, the evidence plainly shews that they were frequently disregarded. If, for example, we accept the account given by Hippolytus of Callistus, both Callistus and his Christian master Carphorus pursued the calling of money-lenders (Bunsen, Anal. Ante-Nicæa, i. 371). Cyprian, in his treatise de Lapsis (c. 6), complains that many bishops among the “Lapsi,” neglecting their divine office, “divina procuracione contempta,” had turned their attention to worldly gain, and were wandering about in other provinces, attending markets for the sake of lucre and increasing their capital by lending it out at compound interest,—“negotiationis quaestuosae nundinas aucupari . . . usuris multiplicantibus fœnus augere” (Migne, iv. 183).

It is supposed by Hefele (Beiträge, i. 38) that we may infer from this that there existed in Cyprian’s time no formal declaration from the church on the lawfulness of the practice. It appears, however, more reasonable to conclude that the above bishops had repudiated all further ecclesiastical control. The first canonical decision of which we have evidence relating to the subject is that of the council of Arles (A.D. 314), which directs that all priests practising usury are to be debarred from communion,—“eos juxta formam divinitus datam a communione abstinere” (Mansi, Conc. ii. 472). At the council of Laodicea (? ann. 320) it was decreed, “Non oportere hominem sacratum foenerari, et usuras, et quae dicuntur sesquialteras^b accipere” (ib. ii. 564). This canon was re-enacted with yet greater stringency at the council of Nicaea, when it was decreed that whoever of the clergy should be found indulging in the practice in his dealings with another or demanding “sesquialterae,” should be deposed from his office and excommunicated: “si quis inventus post statutum usuras ex mutuo (ἐκ μεταχειρίσεως) sumere, vel eam rem aliter persequi, vel sesquialteras exigere, vel aliquid aliud excogitare turpis quaestus gratia, e clerico deponatur et sit alienus a canone” (Mansi, ii. 675; ib. iv. 413). The forty-fourth of the Apostolical Canons similarly requires that any “bishop, priest, or deacon” who demands interest from a debtor shall be deprived of his office (Cotelierius, i. 448).

Although the conditions of the mercantile community in the East and the West differed materially in some respects, the fathers of the two churches are equally explicit and systematic in their condemnation of the practice of usury. Among those belonging to the Greek church we find Athanasius (Expos. in Ps. xiv.); Basil the Great (Hom. in Ps. xiv.); Gregory of Nazianzum (Orat. xvi. in Patrem tacentem), Gregory of Nyssa (Orat. cont. Usurarios), Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. iv. c. 37), Epiphanius (adv. Haeres. Epilog. c. 24), Chrysostom (Hom. xli. in Genes.), and Theodoret (Interpr. in Ps. xiv. 5, and liv. 11). Among those belonging to the Latin church, Hilary of Poitiers (in Ps. xiv.), Ambrose (de Tobia liber unus), Jerome (in Ezech. vi. 18), Augustine (de Baptismo contr. Donatistas, iv. 19), Leo the Great (Epist. iii. 4), and Cassiodorus (in Ps. xiv. 10). Among these writers some evince less disposition to appeal exclusively to the Mosaic law; Basil, for example, cites Luke vi. 34, 35; Chrysostom, Matth. v. 42; Gregory of Nyssa, the fate of the unmerciful servant in the parable (Matth. xviii. 23–35), and the fifth petition in the Lord’s Prayer. Ambrose, whose treatise de Tobia is entirely devoted to the condemnation of usury, quotes the sentiment of Cato,—“foenerare est hominem occidere,” and inveighs strongly against the cruelty involved in the practice. “The borrower,” he says to the usurers, “asks of you medicine, and you give him poison; bread, and you proffer him a sword; liberty, and you condemn him to slavery!” Referring to the technical term “centesima,” he asks whether it might not better serve to recall to our recollection Him who came to seek the hundredth lost sheep? (Migne, xiv. 591–622). Christ, he says, came to fulfil the law, not to destroy it, consequently the Mosaic prohibition is still in force. Leo the Great, in his letter to the bishops of Campania and Picenum, implies that the clergy sometimes evaded the prohibition by lending their money in the name of another, and declares this to be equally forbidden. He laments that even laymen, who wish to be considered Christians, should practise the usurer’s calling,—“quod et in laicos cadere, qui Christianos se dici cupiunt, condelemus” (Epist. 5; Migne, liv. 615). Chrysostom refers to the legislation which forbade senators (τοὺς . . . εἰς τὴν μεγάλην τελοῦντας βουλὴν, ἣν σύγκλητον καλοῦσι) to take interest for loans, and contrasts the usurer's craft with that of the husbandman, the grazier, or the artisan, affirming that his gain is a harvest reaped without the aid of soil, plough or rain (in Matt. Hom. lvii.; Migne, Patrol. Graec. lvi.ii. 557).

^b “Sesquialterae” or ἡμιόλια, a Byzantine term for interest half as much as the capital, or 150 per cent.

The conditions of modern society and commercial life have involved such a revolution in the conceptions respecting the employment of capital, that the arguments whereby it was sought to justify the Mosaic condemnation of usury now appear scarcely intelligible. It was objected that usury was an infringement of equal dealing, because more was given by the borrower than he received,—that it was ruinous to many, while serviceable to but few,—that it was oppression of the poor man under the guise of rendering him a service (August. in Ps. xxxvi. Serm. 3; Ambrose, de Offic. iii. 3; Chrysost. in Matth. Hom. 56). When it was asked, as an extreme case, whether the man who lent a bushel of corn to his neighbour, from which the latter reaped tenfold, might not justly claim to share equally in the gain, Jerome replied by citing Gal. vi. 7, and by a quibble worthy only of a professed dialectician (ad Ezech. vi. 18; Opera, ed. Migne, vi. 176). This excess of stringency produced its natural results and evasion was frequently resorted to. Ambrose (de Tobia, c. 14) states that it was a common practice for those who lent money (especially the wealthy) to receive the interest in the form of goods.

The canons of later councils differ materially in relation to this subject, and indicate a distinct tendency to mitigate the rigour of the Nicæan interdict. That of the council of Carthage of the year 348 enforces the original prohibition, but without the penalty, and grounds the veto on both Old and New Testament authority, “nemo contra prophetas, nemo contra evangelia facit sine periculo” (Mansi, iii. 158). The language, however, when compared with that of the council of Carthage of the year 419, serves to suggest that, in the interval, the lower clergy had occasionally been found having recourse to the forbidden practice, for the general terms of the earlier canon, “ut non liceat clericis fenerari,” are enforced with greater particularity in the latter, “Nec omnino cuiquam clericorum liceat de quolibet re foenus accipere” (Mansi, iv. 423). This supposition is supported by the language of the council of Orleans (A.D. 538), which appears to imply that deacons were not prohibited from lending money at interest, “Et clericus a diaconatu, et supra, pecuniam non commodet ad usuras” (ib. ix. 18). Similarly, at the second council of Trullanum (A.D. 692) a like liberty would appear to have been recognised among the lower clergy (Hardouin, iii. 1663). While, again, the Nicæan canon requires the immediate deposition of the ecclesiastic found guilty of the practice, the Apostolical canon enjoins that such deposition is to take place only after he has been admonished and has disregarded the admonition.

On the other hand, at the second council of Arles (A.D. 452), we find that such an offence on the part of an ecclesiastic was required to be punished not only by deposition but also by excommunication, “depositus a communione alienus fiat” (Mansi, vii. 880).

Generally speaking, the evidence points to the conclusion that the church imposed no penalty on the layman. St. Basil (Epist. clxxxviii. can. 12), says that a usurer may even be admitted to orders, provided he gives his acquired wealth to the poor and abstains for the future from the pursuit of gain (Migne, Patrol. Graec. xxxii. 275). Gregory of Nyssa says that usury, unlike theft, the desecration of tombs, and sacrilege (τεροσυλία), is allowed to pass unpunished, although among the things forbidden by Scripture, nor is a candidate at ordination ever asked whether or no he has been guilty of the practice (Migne, ib. xlv. 233). A letter of Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. vi. 24) relating an experience of his friend Maximus, appears to imply that no blame attached to lending money at the legal rate of interest, and that even a bishop might be a creditor on those terms. We find also Desideratus, bishop of Verdun, when applying for a loan to king Theodebert, for the relief of his impoverished diocese, promising repayment, “cum usuris legitimis,” an expression which would seem to imply that in the Gallican church usury was recognised as lawful under certain conditions (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iii. 34). So again a letter (Epist. ix. 38) of Gregory the Great seems to shew that he did not regard the payment of interest for money advanced by one layman to another as unlawful. But, on the other hand, we find in what is known as archbishop Theodore's Penitential (circ. A.D. 690) what appears to be a general law on the subject, enjoining “Si quis usuras undecunque exegerit . . . tres annos in pane et aqua” (c. xxv. 3); a penance again enjoined in the Penitential of Egbert of York (c. ii. 30). In like manner, the legates, George and Theophylact, in reporting their proceedings in England to pope Adrian I. (A.D. 787), state that they have prohibited “usurers,” and cite the authority of the Psalmist and St. Augustine (Haddan and Stubbs, Conc. iii. 457). The councils of Mayence, Rheims, and Châlons, in the year 813, and that of Aachen in the year 816, seem to have laid down the same prohibition as binding both on the clergy and the laity (Hardouin, Conc. iv. 1011, 1020, 1033, 1100).

Muratori, in his dissertation on the subject (Antichità, vol. i.), observes that “we do not know exactly how commerce was transacted in the five preceding centuries,” and consequently are ignorant as to the terms on which loans of money were effected. A later period shews us, to use the language of Mr. Pearson, “the moral guides of society, on the one hand, endeavouring to enforce a law which was, without abatement, the law prescribed originally for the Hebrews in Palestine; while, on the other, foreign wars, foreign commerce, and the perfectly unequal division of land, were introducing entirely new conditions of life, which could not be satisfied by the provisions designed for a nation living under totally different circumstances” (Theories on Usury, p. 16). See also Funk, Gesch. des Kirchlichen Zinsverbotes, Tübingen, 1876.

[J. B. M.]

* A canon of the council of Agde (A.D. 506): “Seditionarios nunquam ordinandos, sicut nec usurarios,” etc., probably points to a distinction drawn by the church between the professional usurer and those who only occasionally practised usury (Mansi, viii. 536).

V

VACANCY. The voidance of a see by a bishop's death was often the occasion of abuse and outrage, which the church in various parts made successive and (it may be added) not unsuccessful efforts to restrain.

There are three factors which must be kept distinct in any discussion about the property of a vacant benefice, bishopric or other. There is (1) the property of the deceased (spolia); (2) the revenue of the benefice in the interval (deportus) and (3) the income at the beginning—a year or half a year—of the new incumbency (annata).

The twenty-eighth canon of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, stands thus: "That it is not lawful for clergymen after the death of their bishop to seize what belongs to him, as has been forbidden by the canons of old time" (sc. Can. Apost. 40; Can. Antioch. 24). A reference to the Antiochene canon here quoted shews that it is the private property of the bishop, and not the estate of the see which the canon was designed to protect.

A canon such as the following shews what sometimes took place on the voidance of a see. "This also is determined, that on a bishop's being summoned from this world at the Lord's bidding, clerics keep rapacious hands from all furniture or whatever is in the church house or belongs to the bishop, in books, valuables (speciebus), utensils, vessels, produce, flocks, animals or all property altogether, and plunder nothing like robbers." (Conc. Valentinum Hispan. cap. 2, A.D. 524).

By the following chapter of the same council, the kindred of a bishop dying intestate were forbidden to touch anything without the sanction of the metropolitan or four provincial bishops. They were required to wait for the ordination of his successor. The reason assigned is lest they should touch some of the official property, which might have got mixed with what would descend to his heirs. Other precautions to the same effect are laid down both in the seventh and the ninth councils of Toledo. The Visigothic law (l. 5, t. i. c. 2) even directs that every bishop should at the commencement of his episcopate verify the inventory made by his predecessor.

The second council of Orleans (A.D. 533) enacted that the bishop who came for the funeral should demand "praeter expensam necessariam nihil pretii pro fatigatione." The same council also provided that he should call the presbyters together and, going to the bishop's residence (domum ecclesiae), should leave it when inventoried (descriptam) to the custody of fit persons. So strict were the directions afterwards issued by Gregory the Great that not even the cost of the inventory might be taken out of the episcopal property.

From a canon of the Trullan Council (c. 35) it appears that on the death of a bishop his own goods and those of his church were under the custody of the clergy, or in default of that under the custody of the metropolitan, who shall give them to the successor in the see.

Besides the visiting bishop or the clergy the archdeacon is often named as the proper guardian of the vacant see. "Patrimonio ecclesiae in gubernatione archidiaconi ejusdem ecclesiae constituto," says (Ep. 7) pope Agapetus († 536). The same arrangement is enjoined in France by the council of Paris in 615 (can. 7). For the form of appointing a bishop to take temporary charge of a vacant diocese, see Liber Diurnus, c. iii. tit. 11.

From the seventh and eighth canons of the same council of Paris Thomassin (Discipline de l'Eglise, pt. ii. Liv. iv. c. 25, 4) draws the following conclusions as to the state of the church under this head at the beginning of the 7th century. 1. Other churches besides cathedrals were despoiled at the death of their incumbent. 2. Bishops and archdeacons seized the "spoil" of abbeys and other benefices. 3. This was done under specious pretences, as that all other churches were but offshoots from the cathedral. 4. The "spoils" went to the commonalty of the clergy (sc. the cathedral body), and not to the bishop or the archdeacon in particular. 5. The council condemns the abuse. 6. Both the revenues of the vacant church and the private property of the deceased incumbent were despoiled. 7. The spoliation took place under the authority of sovereigns, magistrates, and magnates. 8. Archdeacons are recognised as the proper guardians of all the property of the vacant bishopric and of other vacant churches. 9. The clergy are associated with them in this charge. 10. That these ancient outrages, being so condemned, lend no colour of justification to any pretended rights of spoliation, which in later times have been based upon them. 11. But most important of all (says Thomassin) is this deduction from the language of the canons—that temporal princes were not yet put in possession of the guardianship of the vacant sees or abbeys. Yet it must be observed that Clothaire the Second, when confirming by an edict the decrees of this council of Paris, seems to reserve to himself the right of making certain donations (praeceptiones nostrae) from the goods of a vacant see.

The lengths to which the outrage of "spoliation" sometimes went may be gathered from a story told by Gregory of Tours (lib. 6, c. 13). The clergy of Marseilles combined with the governor against their bishop. The bishop was arrested, and the clergy themselves pillaged the residences of the bishop, and made a raid upon his property, just (adds the narrative) as if the bishop were already dead. This licence, however, must not be supposed universal, as there is a marked absence of any allusion to it in the letters of Gregory the Great about the property of vacant sees. The first recorded instance in Rome is that recorded by Anastasius (A.D. 638) of the pillage of the church of St. John Lateran on the accession of Severinus.

The great point to be established upon the subject is that in early days the sovereign did not pretend to have any rights either upon the property of deceased bishops or upon the proceeds of vacant sees. This appears conclusively from two examples, also given by Gregory of Tours (l. 10, c. 19). Giles, the bishop of Rheims, was deposed and exiled. In his chests large sums of money were found. The king confiscated that portion of it which had been gotten by illicit means; the rest was left. Again, Baudin, the sixteenth bishop of Tours, was enabled to distribute amongst the poor a very large sum of money ("amplius quam viginti millia solidorum"), which his predecessor had left, and which clearly had not escheated to the crown.

The letter of Gregory the Great to the clergy and people of Hortona (lib. iii. Ep. 39) is a good specimen of his action during a vacancy. "We solemnly delegate the visitation of the destitute church to our brother and co-bishop, Barbarus. To whom we have given in charge 'ut nihil de redditu, ornatu, ministeriisque a quoquam usurpari patiatur'. . . . We have given him licence to ordain priests and deacons, if need be," &c. In another case (Lib. iv. Ep. 12) he directs that the bishop-visitor of the church of Agrigentum should receive the same income for his services as the regular bishop would receive. At times the arrival of the visitor-bishop was the occasion of a squabble. How pope Gregory dealt with such a difficulty may be seen in his letter to Leontius, who was made bishop-visitor of Rimini (Lib. iv. Ep. 42). [VISITATOR.]

In reply to the claim that has at times been made of the right of the pope to the "spoil" of a vacant see, Thomassin quotes words of Gregory the Great addressed to Constantius, bishop of Palermo, who was made visitor of the church of Terracina (lib. vii. Ep. 75): "Mobile vero prae-dictae ecclesiae facta subtiliter volumus describi notitia, nobisque transmitti, ut ex hoc quid fieri debeat, auctore Domino, disponamus." The French writer argues that Gregory would not have considered at his leisure how it should be disposed of, if it had belonged of right to his own church; and he concludes that all the "spoil" of a deceased bishop, and all the revenue of the vacancy belongs to the clergy in common, and the succeeding bishop, whilst ecclesiastical superiors and worldly magnates can pretend to no other glory than that of giving protection to the canons and liberties of the church. Bishops lost neither spolia nor deportus nor annatae; and bishops in their turn preserved the deportus of vacant parochial cures, handing them faithfully to the new incumbents (Discipline de l'Eglise, pt. ii. Liv. iv. c. 26).

That portion of the episcopal revenue which fell to the crown during a vacancy was known by the name of regalia (Ducange, s. v.). When the bishop was dead, it was said to be aperta ("regalia est aperta"), and it so continued until his successor was appointed, when it became clausa. The act of homage or allegiance on the part of the successor preceded the delivery of the regalia to him. [H. T. A.]

VACANTIVI, or, in the Greek form, βακάντιβοι, were clergy who were found in other dioceses than that in which they were first ordained, with letters from their bishop. Against such frequent decrees were made. The council of Agde (c. 52) forbids communion to be given to such wandering clerks, and this is repeated by the council of Epaon (c. 6); the council of Valentia (C. Valentin. c. 5) orders such wanderers, if contumacious, to be deprived both of communion and of orders (Bingham, Antiq. VI. iv. 5).

VAISON, COUNCILS OF (VASENSIA CONCILIA), A.D. 442 and A.D. 529. Formerly there were thought to have been three. 1. Which some make the second, "apud Auspicium episcopum ecclesiae catholicae," says the title, which was the favourite style of the bishops of Rome, when ten canons on discipline were passed, but no subscriptions to them have been preserved (Mansi, vi. 451-60). 2. Which some make the third, where four interesting canons on ritual—one relating to the reading of homilies of the fathers by deacons when no presbyter could be got to preach; another to the saying of the Kyrie eleison, the Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus, the Sicut erat of the Doxology, and recital of the name of the pope for the time being in divine service—follow the first on discipline, with the names of St. Caesarius of Arles and eleven other bishops affixed to them. (Ib. viii. 725-8.) [E. S. Ff.]

VAKASS. The vakass is a vestment or ornament peculiar to the Armenian church. It bears a certain resemblance to the amice, but has a breastplate attached to it, as in the case of the Jewish high-priest; the names or figures of the twelve apostles replacing those of the twelve tribes (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 306; Malan, Liturgy of the Armenian Church). It is doubtful whether we are to view this as a direct imitation of the Jewish ephod, or as really a modification of the Western amice. The Armenians themselves maintain the Jewish origin of the vestment, but the Armenians have borrowed so much from the Roman church that the latter is by many thought the more probable view. In a recent work by a Melchitist of St. Lazare, and therefore of the Roman communion, the vakass is described as "a large collar of precious stuff, to which is attached the amice" (Issaverdens, The Armenian Church, p. 413). VALENCE, COUNCILS OF (VALENTINUM CONCILIA), A.D. 374, A.D. 530, and A.D. 586.

1. When thirty bishops, according to some MSS., met—it is not clear under whose presidency—passed four canons on discipline, and addressed two synodical letters, one to the bishops of France, the other to the clergy and people of Fréjus, inviting attention to their fourth canon respecting candidates for the episcopate, priesthood, or diaconate (Mansi, iii. 491-500). 2. Where the doctrines of freewill and grace were discussed with reference to St. Caesarius of Arles, who was prevented from attending it by ill-health, but deputed able representatives to express and defend his opinions (ib. viii. 723-6). 3. When the donations of king Guntram and of his wife and daughters, to different churches were confirmed by seventeen bishops (Ib. ix. 645-8). [E. S. Ff.]

VALENS, Feb. 16, deacon, martyr with Pamphilus, Seleucius, and Paulus, at Caesarea under Diocletian (Basil. Menol.; Mart. Hieron.). [C. H.]

VALENTIA, COUNCIL OF (VALENTINUM CONCILIUM), A.D. 546, where six chapters on discipline were drawn up by six bishops, and an archdeacon representing a seventh. (Mansi, viii. 619-24; but he suggests a later date for it on the next page.) [E. S. Ff.]

VALENTINA, martyr with Thea and Paulus at Caesarea, under Maximin; commemorated on July 15 (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirllet.); July 25 (Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

VALENTINUS (1), Feb. 14, presbyter, martyr at Rome under Claudius (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker., Rom.). According to Baronius (Mart. Rom. Feb. 14, note) it is this Valentinus who is commemorated on this day in the Gregorian Sacramentary, which names him in the collect and super-oblatæ. He is also celebrated in the Liber Responsalis of Gregory, p. 757; and he is probably the Valentinus commemorated in the Liber Antiphonarius of Gregory, p. 665. Pope Theodorus erected a church in his honour at Rome on the Via Flaminia near the Milvian bridge (Anastas. Biblioth. de Vitis Rom. Pontif. art. THEODORUS, num. 128; Mart. Rom. sub Feb. 14, ed. Baron. note; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 751). On the distinction between this Valentinus and the following see Sollerius's Obs. under Feb. 14 in Usuard.

(2) Feb. 14, bishop of Interamnina, martyr (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Hieron., Notker., Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 754). According to Baronius (l. c.) it is this Valentinus who is commemorated on Feb. 14 with Vitalis and Felicula in the Gelasian Sacramentary, which names them in the collect, the secreta, and the post-communion. The name Valentinus, but undistinguished, occurs briefly in the metrical martyrologies of Bede and Wandalbert. In the latter case it is the bishop according to Baronius (l. c.). For other saints of the same name commemorated on this day see Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. pp. 742, 762, 763.

(3) Nov. 13, martyr, commemorated at Ravenna with Solutor and Victor (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Hieron., Vet. Rom., Rom.).

(4) Dec. 16, martyr, commemorated at Ravenna with Navalis and Agricola (Mart. Usuard., Hieron. Rom.). [C. H.]

VALENTIO (VALENTINUS), martyr, commemorated with Pasirates at Durostorum in Moesia by the Latins on May 25 (Mart. Usuard., Notker., Rom.); by the Greeks on Apr. 24 (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Græc. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

VALERIANUS (1), Jan. 20, martyr of Trapezus with Candidus and Aquila under Diocletian (Basil. Menol.); Jan. 20, 21 (Cal. Byzant.); Jan. 21 (Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 251).

(2) April 14, commemorated with Tibertius and Maximus at Rome on the Via Appia in the cemetery of Praetextatus (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Hieron., Vet. Rom., Notker., Rom.); Nov. 24 (Basil. Menol.); Nov. 22 (Menol. Græc. Sirlet.).

VEILS, Eucharistic, in the Eastern church. The Eucharistic veils in use by the Greek church were three in number: (1) the paten veil (διοκάλυμμα, called in the Syriac ritual Nauphar or Anaphora), for covering the holy bread; (2) the chalice veil; (3) a very thin, transparent veil, known as ἀῆρ, or νεφέλη, spread over both (Renaudot, Lit. Or. i. 304; ii. 61). They were always of the finest and best materials procurable. The disk-veils at St. Sophia's were of cloth of gold, embroidered with pearls (Descript. S. Soph. Anon. apud Du Cange). According to the mystical interpretation of Germanus, the disk-veil represented the napkin that was about our Lord's head; and the ἀῆρ either the shining cloud at the Transfiguration, or the stone which closed the door of the sepulchre (Goar, Euchol. 121, 838). To these should be added the εἰλητόν or corporale, called also καταπέτασμα (Renaudot, i. 195), the altar-cloth covering the Holy Table, on which the paten and chalice stood, which, according to the same authority, symbolised the fine linen cloth in which our Lord's body was wrapped (Goar, Euchol. 101, 130, 838, 849).

The ritual of the veils, as given in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, is as follows. (N.B. The references are to Savile's edition of Chrysostom, vol. vi.) At the prothesis the priest censes the paten veil, and after the asterisk has been placed over the holy bread, covers the whole with it, with words from Ps. 93: "The Lord hath put on glorious apparel, and girded Himself with strength." He then censes the chalice veil and covers the holy cup with it, while he utters (Habakkuk iii. 3), "His glory covered the heavens, and the earth was full of His praise." After this he censes the ἀῆρ and spreads it over both paten and chalice with the words (Ps. xvii. 8), "Hide me under the shadow of Thy wings" (p. 986). At the celebration, after the Gospel has been read, the priest takes the εἰλητόν and unfolds it, and places it on the holy table before the εἰρηνικά (p. 993). At the great entrance the ἀῆρ is placed over the left shoulder of the deacon at the same time that the disk is put on his head (p. 994). The priest then removes the veils from the paten and chalice, and taking the ἀῆρ from the deacon's shoulders and censing it covers the holy things with it (p. 995). The deacon then takes the asterisk and puts it cross-wise over the disk, and having sponged it on the εἰλητόν, he covers it with the ἀήρ, and if there is no fan he fans the holy things with the paten veil (p. 997). After the priest has communicated he sponges the cup and his own lips with the veil (p. 1002). After the deacon has communicated he sponges the disk over the cup, and covers the cup with the veil, and replaces the asterisk and the veil over the disk (p. 1003). Finally, after the washing of the cup and cleansing of the disk he covers the holy things, the cup and the disk with the veils, according to custom (p. 1004). The form of consecration of disk veils in the Coptic church is given by Renaudot (Liturg. Orient. i. 304). [E. V.]

VENANTIUS (1), Apr. 1, bishop, martyr (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Notker., Rom.). There was a monastery bearing the name of Venantius at Constantinople in the 6th century (Mansi, viii. 1056 B; Du Cange, Cypris. Christ. lib. iv. p. 162). The oratory of St. Stephen in the Vatican basilica is said to have been called also that of Venantius (Rasponi, de Basilica Vaticana, p. 234; Ciampini, de Sacr. Aedif. p. 17).

(2) Abbat, commemorated at Tours on Oct. 11 (Mart. Flor.); Oct. 13 (Mart. Usuard., Mart. Rom.); Oct. 23 (Notker.). [C. H.]

VENITE. [INVITATORIUM.]

VENTRILQUUS. The "master of obh" was frequently called ventriloquus, ἐγγαστρίμυθος, ἐγγαστρίμυθης, σπεριόμυθης; though the Hebrews, according to Bochart, "ariolum id genus non ex ventre, sed ex axillis vocem emississe somniant" (Hieroz. iii. 5). To prove this he cites the Talmud in Sanhedrin 7, the gloss on it, and Rabb. Selomo on Deut. xviii. 11. Mai-monides (de Idol. vi. 2) says that these diviners after certain ceremonies appear to be "consulting another person, who speaks with them and answers their questions from the earth in a very low voice, which they cannot hear with their ears, but only perceive in their mind"; or they "fumigate the skull of a dead man and sing charms, until they hear a voice going before them coming out of their armpits, and an answer is given them." It is evident, at least, that the voice was generally traced to some part of the person. Thus Plutarch says that "the ventriloqui [formerly called Eurycleitae, from Eurycles a soothsayer; see Hesychius, Suidas] are now called pythons" (de Orac. Defectu, Reiske, vii. 632). The italic version of Lev. xx. 27 gives "ventriloquus" (Sabatier); that of Isaiah viii. 19, "Qui de terra loquuntur, qui de ventre clamitant." So the LXX render obh by ἐγγαστρίμυθος in Lev. xix. 31; xx. 6, 27; 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, 9; Isaiah xlv. 25; &c. That such diviners were ventriloqui in the common belief appears also from various ancient writers. Origen affirms that some "from the earliest age have been under the influence of a demon, whom they call python, i.e. a ventriloquus" (de Princip. iii. § 5); an opinion noted by St. Jerome as unsound (Ep. 124, ad Avit. 8), but only as to the early possession, for the latter himself paraphrases Is. viii.

9, thus, "Quaerite ventriloquos, quos pythonas intelligimus" (Comment. in loc.). Gregory Nyss. says, referring to the witch of Endor, "One form of deceit was that of the ventriloquus, whose magic art was skilled to drag back to the life above the souls of the departed" (de Pythonissa Ep. i. 869). VERBERIES, COUNCIL OF (VERMERI-ENSE CONCILIIUM), A.D. 753. Several canons on discipline are found in Gratian and elsewhere given to a council at this place, which is thought to have met in the first year of king Pepin, and been attended by him. (Mansi, xii. 365-8.) [E. S. Ff.]

VERIANUS, Aug. 9, martyr at Colonia in Etruria under Decius, commemorated with Secundianus and Marcellianus (Mart. Usuard., Notker., Rom.). [C. H.]

VERN or VER, COUNCIL OF (VERNENSE CONCILIIUM), A.D. 755, held by order of king Pepin in his palace there, when twenty-five canons on discipline were published. (Mansi, xii. 577-86, who thinks, however, it should be dated A.D. 756). [E. S. Ff.]

VEROLUS, Feb. 21, martyr, commemorated at Adrumetum with Secundinus, Servulus, and others (Mart. Usuard., Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

VERONICA, commemorated at Antioch on Apr. 20 with Prosdocius and Romanus (Mart. Syr.); Apr. 15 at Antioch with Prosdocius (Hieron.); July 11 at Antioch with Prodxia and Speciosa (*Mart. VERSE, VERSICLE. A short verse or text said by the priest in the course of the liturgy or the divine office, to which the congregation replied in another short verse or text called a Response. Some of these versicles, as the Sursum Corda in the liturgy, and the "Deus in adiutorium," which occurs at the commencement of all the Hours, are of great antiquity. The latter is mentioned by Cassian (Collat. x. 10), and in the rule of St. Benedict (cap. x.). Mediæval Monastic Consuetudinaries contained elaborate regulations for their use, of which a specimen may be seen in the Antiq. Consuetudines Canon. Regularium, S. Victoris, Paris., printed by Martene (de Antiq. Eccles. Rit. tom. iii. p. 279, edit. 1788). Their rationale and the ritual reason why are described at length by Amalarius, de Eccles. Off. iv. 13, et passim. Technical names were applied to some of these versicles. "O Lord, open thou our lips," with which nocturns opened (Amalar. de Eccl. Offic. iv. c. 9), was called "Versus Apertionis," and the verse "Let us bless the Lord," with which most offices concluded, was hence called "Versus Clusor."

VESTMENTS. On this subject there have been two leading theories: the one viewing Christian vestments as a direct imitation of the Levitical, the other deriving these from the dress of ordinary life prevalent in the early ages of Christianity. The former theory does not probably meet with any wide-spread acceptance at the present day. Some of the most characteristic features of the Jewish dress are unrepresented in the Christian. Thus, whereas in the Levitical priestly dress the element of colour is strongly marked, we have every reason to believe that the dress worn by the ministers in primitive times was simply white [COLOUR]. Again, the head-dress of Jewish priests, to say nothing of the more striking cap of the high priest, with its golden πέταλον, had for a long time nothing to answer to it among Christian vestments; for, as we have already shewn [MITRE], any satisfactory traces of a use of an official head-dress on the part of the Christian clergy are hardly to be found for the first thousand years. So too the coloured girdle of the Jewish priest fails to reappear, for the GIRDLE is not met with as a recognised Christian vestment till the 8th century. Conversely the Christian vestment par excellence, the chasuble [CASULA], is utterly unlike anything in the Jewish dress.

Now, on the other hand, when we come to consider the nature of the secular dress worn under the empire in the early times of Christianity, we are at once met with a large amount of coincidence in the form of the dresses and in the names.

the toga being now rather old-fashioned. If we take as our stand-point for Christian vestments the records of the fourth council of Toledo (A.D. 633), to which we have often referred already, we have mention made of alb, planeta, and orarium. Here, then, we have the tunic in the ALB, the super-vestment in the PLANETA, and an ornament, whose secular origin is absolutely demonstrable in the orarium. [STOLE.] The planeta does not under that name meet us as a secular dress used by heathens, though we do find it worn by Christian laymen; still its shape is practically the same as the paenula, which meets us again and again in heathen writers, and which is identical in name with the Eastern equivalent of the chasuble, the φενόλιον. [PAENULA.] The casula, another variety of the same dress, whose name has given rise to the modern chasuble, is itself found in use by Christian laymen. As regards other varieties of the tunic, the DALMATIC is first met with as in use by a Roman emperor; the Greek στοιχάριον [STICHARION] is first mentioned in connexion with the dress of ordinary life. Another form of super-vestment, the COPE, has certainly had a similar origin. The STOLE and the MANIPLE, again, were both, as has been already shewn, in their origin of the nature of handkerchiefs, carried in the hand; nor can there be any reasonable doubt that in such things as the OMOPHORION, archiepiscopal PALLIUM, &c., are mere modifications of what in its simplest form we know as the stole.

On the general subject of the history of Christian vestments reference may be made to Marriott, Vestiarium Christianum; Hefele, Die Liturgischen Gewänder in his Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte Archæologie und Liturgie, vol. ii.; Rock, The Church of our Fathers, London, 1848; Bock, Die Liturgischen Gewänder des Mittelalters, &c.

VESTRY. (Secretarium, secretaria, sacristia, sacrarium, vestiarium. Διακονικόν, βεστιδριον.) Among the exedrae of an ancient church was an apartment to which these terms were applied. Some writers take it for a part of the church itself, whilst others are of opinion that it was a distinct building. (See Bingham, Antiq. VIII. vii. 7.)

We find that in early, as in modern days, not only the vestments but also the treasures of the church were sometimes kept in the vestry [SCEUOPHYLACIUM]. Sacred vessels were kept there (in secretario), no one being allowed to touch them except the subdeacon or acolyte (Capitula Martini Brac. c. 41. cent. vi.). Besides eucharistic vessels, a gold cross of six pounds weight is given by pope John III. († 573), "ex sacro nostro vestiario." Gregory the Great, when he would give six coins to the angel who appeared to him in the guise of a shipwrecked sailor, was informed that there were no coins in his vestry (Joh. Diac. Vita S. Greg. Mag. lib. i. c. 10). In these passages, however, as well as in several others quoted by Ducange, it may be doubted whether the vestiarium was an attachment of a church. It seems rather to have formed a portion of a royal or pontifical establishment.

Another point of resemblance between the ancient and the modern use of the vestry is found in the fact that it was used as a place of meeting. From this it may be inferred that the vestry was sometimes a place of considerable size. The third, fourth, and fifth councils of Carthage were spoken of as in secretario basilicæ restitutæ. The synod of Arles was held "in secretario ecclesiæ." The same is true of a multitude of other councils. Just as the modern word vestry means both the place where a meeting is held, and also the assembly or session that takes place there, so we find a similar transition in the Latin word secretarium, which at times means a part of a church, and at times a session of a council held in that part. Hence we get such phrases as "secretarium venturum" for the "coming session" (see Conc. Rom. ii. act. 1 ad fin.).

There were some other uses to which the vestry was at times appropriated. Du Cange (in Paul. Silent. p. 594) shews that it was sometimes used as a place of confinement for delinquent ecclesiastics, and pope Gregory II. in a letter to the emperor Isaurus contrasts the actions of a secular with that of a spiritual judge. The former confiscates, hangs, beheads; but the latter places the gospel and the cross about the culprit's neck, shuts him in the vestry, and puts fasting in his stomach, vigil in his eyes and doxology in his mouth.

Sometimes the vestry became the lodging of an ecclesiastic. Sulpicius Severus relates that St. Martin had his lodging "in secretario ecclesiæ," and that after his decease, all the Virgins burst into the apartment, licked the several spots where the saint had sat or stood, and appropriated the straw upon which he had lain. Bingham (Antiq. VIII. vii. 8) shews that the vestry was also called receptorium and salutatorium, as being the scene of pastoral intercourse between clergy and people. [H. T. A.]

VEXILLUM. (1) The principal Christian banner has already been described under LABARUM. From an ancient period banners were carried in processions, the bearers of which were called DRACONARI or vexilliferi. When Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. v. 4) speaks of a procession to a basilica "post crucem præcedentibus signis," we are no doubt to understand that a cross headed the procession, followed by banners. Similarly Honorius of Autun (Geranius Animæ, i. 72) says, "ante nos crux et vexilla geruntur." An old use of Sarum ordered a banner of sackcloth to be carried in the procession at the Reconciliation of Penitents. (2) The word vexillum is sometimes applied to the processional cross itself (Durandus, Innocent III.) [C.]

VIATICUM. This word, which occurs frequently in classical authors denoting "provision for a journey," is, together with its Greek equivalent ἐφόδιον, often used in early Christian writings to denote the Eucharist, generally, but not always, as the communion given to a sick person before impending death. "This mystery is sometimes called 'viaticum,' because, if any one enjoys it on the way, he will arrive at that life which he already has within himself" (Car. Mag. lib. vii. 101). "This word 'viaticum' is the name of communion, that is to say, 'the guardianship of the way,' for it guards the soul until it shall stand before the judgment-seat of Christ" (Synodus Hibernensis, lib. ii. c. 16, Wasserschleben's edit. p. 20).

The phrase τὰ ἐφόδια τοῦ Θεοῦ is used by St. Clement in a passage (Ep. 1 ad Cor. cap. ii.) which need not necessarily bear, although it is not incapable of bearing, a Eucharistic reference, but which is usually interpreted as involving a general reference to the "doctrines and means of salvation," as where the same phrase is used by St. Basil (Ep. lviii., cclix. ad Melet. tom. iii. pp. 157, 384) and by St. Cyril of Jerusalem, of faith (Hom. Catechet. v. § 12). The phrase ἐφόδιον ζωῆς αἰδίου is employed by St. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 33), which is like the words ἐφόδιον ζωῆς αἰωνίου, which occur in the liturgies of St. James, St. Basil, and St. Mark, with a necessarily Eucharistic meaning (in the Prayer of Thanksgiving, Hammond, Liturgies, etc. p. 191). Bede, in his account of the death-bed of Caedmon, speaks of his last communion as "caeleste viaticum" (H. E. iv. 24), and describes its reception in his hand. Amalarius speaks of the "viaticum morientis" (de Eccl. Off. iii. 35). The expression ἐφόδιον τῆς σωτηρίας occurs in an Eastern formula of indulgence (Goar, Eucholog. p. 682). The earliest extant conciliar direction on the subject is can. xiii. of the council of Nice, ordaining that "none, even of the lapsed, shall be deprived of the last and most necessary viaticum (τοῦ τελευταίου καὶ ἀναγκασιότατου ἐφοδίου), but let the old canonical law be observed . . . let the bishop, upon examination, give the oblation to all who desire to partake of the Eucharist upon the point of death." This direction is re-enforced in varying phraseology by the following councils: iv. Carth. cc. 76, 77, 79; i. Araus. c. 3; ii. Vasens. c. 2; Gerundens. c. 9; ii. Arelat. c. 28; Agath. c. 15; Epaoen. c. 36; iii. Aurel. c. 6; i. Matisce. 12; xi. Tolet. c. 11. By all these canons the administration of the viaticum is enjoined, even to apostates and parricides, without waiting for the fulfilment of the incurred course of penitential discipline, although stipulating for its completion in case of recovery. Another relaxation of church rule lay in the fact that it was permitted to be received by persons not fasting. Cardinal Bona calls this exemption a "praxis ecclesiæ ubique recepta," but gives no authorities for his statement (Rev. Lit. i. c. xxi. § 2). Alcuin refers to its immediate administration in such cases as a "lex antiqua regularisque" (de Div. Off. p. 79, edit. Hittorp.), but the abolition of this formal pre-requisite of fasting seems to be a tacit inference or unwritten custom rather than an explicit dispensation resting on conciliar enactment.

The language of the canons recently quoted throws no light on the question whether the death-bed Eucharist involved reservation or otherwise; but there is plentiful evidence from other sources that the dying person was usually communicated from the reserved sacrament [RESERVATION]. It was carried in a vessel called a CHRISMAL [p. 356], and various penalties were assigned by St. Columbanus for dropping it accidentally, or leaving it behind through negligence (Reg. Coenob. xv.). The capitularies of Charlemagne order that "the priest should always have the Eucharist in readiness, that if any one is ill, and if a child is ill, he may communicate him at once, that he may not die without communion" (lib. i. c. 161). Sometimes, but rarely, there seems to have been a private and special celebration of the Eucharist in a sick man's house. Paulinus, bishop of Nola (409-31), had an altar in his sick chamber, at which he consecrated the Eucharist not long before his death (Uranius, Vit. Paulin. § 2). Such was possibly the object of the invitation to St. Ambrose to offer the sacrifice in a private house at Rome (Paulin. Vit. Ambros. as quoted by Bingham without further reference, but in chap. xlvii. Paulinus evidently refers to the reserved Eucharist).

It has been a subject of discussion whether the viaticum was administered in one or in both kinds. Bede describes a dying boy as refreshed "viatico Dominici corporis et sanguinis accepto," although the words which describe his act of communion have been sometimes interpreted to refer to one kind only, "simul et infirmanti puero de eodem sacrificio Dominicæ oblationis particulam deferri mandavit" (H. E. i. 14). The same inference has been drawn from the language in which the communion of Serapion is described by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 44). But if the decision of the question is to turn upon the use of the singular or plural number, counter evidence is supplied by the description of the reserved Eucharist found on St. Cuthbert's body, "oblatis super sanctum corpus positis" (Lingard, Anglo-Saxon Church, ii. p. 44, edit. 1858). This tallies with other and direct evidence that a sick person was usually communicated in both species (Concil. Tolet. c. xi. Reginon. lib. 1, de Eccles. Discip. cap. 119). The decolorization of the reserved sacrament alluded to as a test of its corruption in the Regula S. Columbani, c. xv. possibly points to the twofold but conjoint reservation of both elements. The Eastern custom of the simultaneous administration of both reserved elements is implied in the wording of the formulæ in several ancient Western service-books, e.g. in the offices for the Communion of the Sick in the Celtic books of Deer, Dimma, and Moling: "Corpus et sanguis Domini nostri Jesu Christi filii Dei vivi conservet animam tuam in vitam perpetuam" (Book of Dimma, fol. 53 b). "Corpus cum sanguine Domini nostri Jesu Christi sanctus sit tibi in vitam æternam" [perpetuam et salutem, Book of Deer] (Book of Moling, ad fin. Ev. S. Mat.).

The formula in an ancient Ambrosian ordo, quoted by Gerbertus (Liturg. Aleman. ii. 487), is still more explicit: "Corpus Domini nostri Jesu Christi, sanguine suo inlitum intinctum, mundet te ab omni peccato."

Here there is a literal compliance with an order of the council of Tours (A.D. 813), which enacted in reference to the viaticum that "sacra oblatio intacta debet esse in sanguine Christi, ut veraciter presbyter possit dicere infirmo, corpus et sanguis Domini proficiat tibi," &c. (Gerbert, de Liturg. Aleman. disquis. v. c. iii. § 4). There was a curious provision sometimes made (iv. Conc. Carthag. can. 76; xi. Toled. can. xi.), that in case of extreme infirmity the sick person might be communicated in one kind only, from the chalice, its liquid contents being poured into his mouth when he was unable to swallow solid food.

It was the office of the deacon to convey the viaticum to the dying, as it was his duty to take the Eucharist to the absent in Justin Martyr's time (Apol. i. 65); but in cases of emergency any ordinary messenger might be despatched with it, as in the case of that sent to the dying Serapion under the circumstances described by Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, and recorded by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 44). This permission to employ any agent was afterwards abolished as derogatory to the dignity of the Eucharist (Concil. Remens. A.D. 813, Regino, lib. i. de Eccles. Discip. cap. 120), but several later visitation articles and episcopal inquiries prove that the custom became by no means immediately extinct.

In cases where the sick man was both anointed and communicated, the unction seems usually to have preceded the viaticum (Ivo Carnotens. Decret. p. xv. c. 35; Martene, lib. i. c. vii. art. 2, and the early ritual offices preserved there), but this was not always or necessarily the case. Sometimes the order was inverted (Caesarii Serm. 265, in appendix S. Aug. Op. tom. v.; Migne, Bib. Pat. Lat. tom. xxxix.), but the evidence for early usage on this point is deficient, the earliest ordines "visitandi infirmum" or "ungendi infirmos" not belonging in their present form to a period before the 9th century (Mabillon, Lit. Gall. lib. i. c. 9; Gerbert, Vet. Lit. Aleman. pars ii. Disquis. 5; Martene, de Antiq. Eccles. Rit. lib. i. c. vii. art. vii.). Compare UNCTION, p. 2004.

VIBIANUS (BIBIANUS), Aug. 28, bishop, confessor at Saintes (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Wand.) [C. H.]

VICAR. Though the term vicarius, or vicarius generalis, is later than the period with which we are concerned, it is, from the nature of the case, probable that bishops who were either infirm or oppressed by extraordinary labours must sometimes have had an assistant, who corresponded more or less to the "Vicar-General" of modern times. In fact, Toutté (Cyrilli Opp., Vita S. Cyr. Diss. i. c. 3, p. 8) does not scruple to call Cyril, who had acted as assistant to his predecessor in catechising and other episcopal offices, the Vicar-General of Jerusalem. So Vincentius (Ruinart, Acta MM. p. 366, ed. 1713) acted as the vicar of Valerius, bishop of Saragossa, so far as preaching was concerned. Paulinus (in Ruinart, p. 251) describes the presbyter Felix of Nola as assisting the successive bishops Maximus and Quintus. Gregory of Nazianzus, as he himself declares (Oratio xviii. p. 327), while still a presbyter, assisted his father, who was bishop of the same see, and afterwards performed similar offices towards Basil the Great at Caesarea. Basil had himself performed similar services for Eusebius (Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. p. 340). In Constantianople the CHARTOPHYLAX was a kind of vicar-general to the patriarch. For episcopal assistants, see COADJUTOR, p. 398. (Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, Bd. I. Th. ii. p. 415 ff.; Altesserrae Asceticon, ii. 13). [C.]

VIGILS (Vigiliae). (1) For the custom of waking in the night for prayer and psalmody, see HOURS OF PRAYER, p. 798.

(2) As a preparation for the greater festivals, vigils were observed in churches for the whole or the greater part of the night. These were called by the Greeks παννυχίδες, by the Latins Pervigilia, or Pernotaciones. Of such Chrysostom speaks (Hom. 4, de Verbis Esaiæ; vi. 121 B, ed. Montfaucon). "See the holy night-long vigils linking day to day." Such vigils preceded not only the great festivals, such as Easter and Pentecost, but also the Sabbath and the Lord's Day (Socrates, H. E. vi. 8). But especially in the case of a martyr it was the custom of the faithful to pass the night preceding his festival in the church which covered his remains, or in one dedicated to him. Thus Chrysostom (Hom. de Martyr. ii. 668 D) says that on the eve of a martyr's festival the faithful had turned night into day by their holy watchings (διὰ τῶν παννυχίδων τῶν ἱερῶν). Against such watchings at the end of the 4th century Vigilantius (Hieron. c. Vigilant, p. 395, Vallarsi) protested, as giving occasion for riot and disorder, and Jerome defended them with his accustomed vigour. Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. v. 17, in Sirmondi Opp. Var. i. 569) describing the celebration of the anniversary of St. Justus at Lyons, mentions the preceding vigil. "We went to the church," he says, "before dawn; there was a concourse of both sexes, greater than the spacious church would hold. After the vigil-office, which was sung antiphonally by the monks and clergy, we separated, going however to no great distance, to be ready for the third hour [nine o'clock in the morning], when we were to join with the priests in the divine office." Here the vigil appears to have begun at an early hour in the morning, not on the evening preceding the festival. Such vigil-offices consisted of prayers, LECTIONS [see p. 252] and psalms, and at least occasionally included preaching (Caesarius of Arles, Sermon. 285 and 300, in Augustine's Works).

The interval which Sidonius mentions between the vigil and the service of the day was a cause of great disorder. There was often dancing and singing, not only in the neighbouring houses, but in the out-buildings of the church, and even in the church itself. As early as the year 305 the council of Eliberis (c. 35) prohibited women from keeping vigil in cemeteries on account of their excesses. A constitution of king Childbert (Hardouin, Concilia, iii. 334) notices the riots which took place at vigils. Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten, V. ii. 154) quotes an article of inquiry from Theodore of Canterbury, complain-

There is in early times no indication that fasting was a condition of a vigil. Chrysostom, indeed, in the homily delivered at Antioch after the earthquake (ii. 718 B.), seems to speak as if fasting was connected with the vigil; but this was on a very special occasion of humiliation. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. x. 31) says that Perpetuus, in the latter half of the 5th century, arranged the fasts and vigils which were to be observed throughout the year, but there is nothing to indicate that the fasts and the vigils were identical. Nicetus, however (De Vigiliis, c. 4, in D'Achery's Spicilegium, iii. 6), does warn his monks to prepare themselves by abstinence for a vigil as for a divine mystery. Pope Nicholas I. (858-867) in his Responsio ad Bulgaros (Mansi, xv. 420) enjoins a fast before the Assumption of the Virgin Mary and before the Nativity of the Lord. Regino (Concil. Germ. ii. 482) quotes a canon of uncertain date, in which presbyters are desired to give notice to the people not only of festivals to be observed but also of vigil-fasts (jejunia vigiliarum). We may say therefore that the observance of a vigil by fasting came to be usual not later than the 9th century. Vigils are of rare occurrence in the oldest calendars. [CALENDAR, p. 258.]

VINE (IN ART). (See John xv. 1; Psalm lxxix.; Isaiah v.). The vine is the most ancient subject of Christian art, perhaps without excepting the Good Shepherd, with which it is so frequently combined [see SHEPHERD, THE GOOD]. It is one of the foremost of the symbols chosen by our Lord Himself from the natural things around Him, as the ancient vines on Mount Olivet still remind the traveller. Its earliest examples in Christian fresco are probably the vine of St. Domitilla [Fresco, p. 693], and those of St. Praetextatus (ib.). The stuccoes of the tomb on the Latin Way, woodcut No. 1 (Bottari, tav.

No. 2. Callistine Catacomb. (Bottari, tav. lxxiv.)

xciii.; Aringhi, ii. 29), certainly existed in Bosio's time, though now unknown, and seem to have been of the 2nd century. The great vine of the Callistine Cemetery (woodcut No. 2) is probably of high antiquity, and is the best-known instance of the graceful naturalism of the Christian classic style of decoration (Bottari, tav. lxxiv.; Aringhi, i. 569). In mosaic, the vines of St. Constantia in Rome are perhaps the earliest example (see Parker's Mosaics of Rome and Ravenna, and a fine fac-simile in the South Kensington Museum). The vine of Galla Placidia's tomb, woodcut No. 3 (combined, like most of the others, with the Good or Royal Shepherd), dates about A.D. 450, and is highly interesting as compared with the stuccoes and also with the Callistine vine.

The three modes of treatment are so distinctly related to each other and to the Domitilla example, and give so clear an illustration of the progress or retrogress from classic naturalism to Byzantine formalism of the highest order, still retaining classic beauty, that woodcuts are given here to illustrate them.

It is surprising to see how far the vine has shared the fate of the Good Shepherd, so as to exist no more as a sacred emblem after the first five or six centuries. Its heathen or ethnic or human use went on; but the use of the vine becomes idly decorative, in churches and houses alike. However, its sculpture is a little later than its painting, and as important. The porphyry sarcophagus of St. Constantia (Aringhi, ii. p. 157) has been photographed by Mr. Parker. See Aringhi, i. 307-9, for vines on unquestionably Christian sarcophagi, St. Constantia's being by no means certain. See also Parker, No. 2917, for a quaint and beautiful sarcophagus, evidently by some zealous and ingenious workman, perhaps of the 3rd century, who cared more for his subject than for the exemplaria Graeca of his art. Again, Bottari, i. p. 1. There was, in 1871, a curious sarcophagus in St. Vitale at Ravenna, where the mind of the sculptor seemed to have been bent on the vine and the acanthus at the same moment. The vine of the columns of Torcello is a late type of Graeco-Byzantine work of the highest order (Stones of Venice, ii. plate 3).

For the vine or grapes on lamps, see Aringhi, i. 517, for two examples, also ii. 648, with the Good Shepherd. Grapes are cut on tombs of various kinds (Lupi, Sev. Epitaph, p. 182; Fabretti, 581). Martigny points to a strong resemblance between certain carvings of this kind at Lyons (De Boissieu, Inscr. Antiq. de Lyons, 1846-54) and Jewish coins in Calnet's Dict. of the Bible, ii. pl. 3, pp. 17-19. From this he infers that both Jews and Christians used the symbol each in their own sense, with reference to a Promised Land. This is confirmed by a glass in Garrucci (Vetri, tav. ii. No. 9), with the inscription, "In Deo, Anima Dulcis, Pie Zeses," which would certainly connect the sacramental and historical senses of the symbol. See also Millin, Midi de la France, pl. lix. 3, xxxviii. 8, for Gallic sarcophagi.

Nevertheless, as Martigny remarks with obvious truth, the eucharistic meaning of the vine or its fruit is later than its original or historic symbolism of the person of our Lord. The first written evidence on this point, he says, is that of Paschasius in the 9th century, De Corpore et Sanguine Christi, c. x. t. ix. Bibl. Patrum, ed. Colon. He mentions a sculpture in which genii with ears of corn are combined with others bearing grapes, of about the same date. It is an Arles sarcophagus (Millin, Midi de la France, pl. lviii. No. 5). There is an amethyst in the Royal Library at Turin (Perret, iv. pl. xvi. No. 52) with a vine-stock and grapes, having corn-ears on each side. Both these may point to the elements. But the real meaning of the vine of Christian symbolism is that assigned it by our Lord's words in St. John xv. He is the vine, His servants are the branches, bearing fruit only while they abide in Him. [R. St. J. T.]

VIRGINS. It is clear that in the course of the 2nd century there arose a strong current of feeling in favour of abstinence from marriage on the part of both men and women. This tendency is not found in Clement of Rome, nor in the Epistle of Barnabas, but it is apparent, though under allegorical forms, in the Shepherd of Hermas (Sim. 9, 10, 11). Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 15) speaks of "many men and women of sixty and seventy years old who have been disciples of Christ since infancy, and have kept themselves uncorrupted." Athenagoras (Legat. c. 32) uses almost similar language. Tatian (adv. Graecos, 32, 33) flings back upon the Gentiles their taunts at Christian virginity. At the end of the century the whole question of the relation of Christianity to marriage was brought prominently into discussion by the rise and prevalence of Montanism; and in the treatises of Tertullian, de Velandis Virginitibus and de Exhortatione Castitatis, the Montanist view is set forth by a zealous advocate. In the next generation Origen (c. Cels. 7, 48) contrasts the Christians who dedicated themselves to a life of virginity for the sake of virginity itself with the pagan priestesses who did so only for the sake of worldly honour. In Cyprian we find, probably for the first time, the expression of the idea that virginity is in itself higher than marriage. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 3, p. 558) and Tertullian (ad Uxor. 1, 8) appear to agree with those who place married continence or widowhood above virginity on the ground that "facile est non appetere quod nescias;" but Cyprian gives the higher rank to virginity (c. g. De Habitu Virg. c. 23; De Mortalit. c. 26).

CHRIST. ANT.—VOL. II.

In the Apostolical Constitutions the same relative rank appears to be implied in the metaphor, that whereas widows are the θυσαστήριον, or altar of sacrifice, virgins are the θυμιαστήριον, the altar upon which was offered the purer offering of incense (Const. Apost. 2, 23; 4, 3; it may be noted as one of the differences between the earlier and later books of the Apostolical Constitutions that in 2, 25 the order is 1, widows; 2, virgins; whereas in the third and later books the order is reversed). Athanasius speaks of the fact that girls of tender years took vows of perpetual virginity as a proof of the power of Christ in fostering the virtue of continence (De Incarnat. Verb. c. 51); and Cyril of Jerusalem (Cateches. 4, 24, p. 64), following Cyprian (de Habitu Virg. c. 22; so also Pseudo-Cyprian de Bono Pudicitiae, c. 7; S. Hieron. Epist. 107 (57) ad Letam, c. 13, S. August. Epist. 150), speaks of those who had taken such vows as living a life like that of the angels; but with the exception of the curious Convivium decem Virginum of Methodius (printed in Migne P. G. vol. xviii. 27 sqq.) the exaggerated praises of virginity which characterise some later literature are almost altogether absent from the genuine and orthodox writings of the first four centuries; those writings undoubtedly contain the germ of the later developments, but it is a significant fact that, when those later developments required the support of the earlier fathers, spurious treatises had to be manufactured, e. g. those of St. Athanasius de Virginitate, Migne, P. G. vol. xviii. 251, and of St. Basil, Op. ed. Bened. vol. i. p. 618. The more sober view of the church seems to be expressed in the language which the Apostolical Constitutions put into the mouth of the apostles: "About virginity we have received no commandment; but we permit it as a vow to those who wish it, only urging this upon them—that they make not any profession rashly. . . . For one who has made a profession, doing works that are worthy of her profession, must shew that her profession is true, and that it is made to give her leisure for religion, and not to cast a slur upon marriage" (Const. Apost. 4, 14).

Those girls or women who thus devoted themselves to lives of virginity came in time to form a separate class or "ordo" in the church. In the single passage of the genuine, or approximately genuine, letters of Ignatius which refers to them, they are apparently co-ordinated with widows (ad Smyrn. c. 13. The text of the passage is obscure, and has given rise to much discussion; the view here taken is that of Zahn in Gebhardt and Harnack's Patres Apostolici, fasc. ii. p. 95, which is strongly confirmed by the gloss on the corresponding passage in the interpolated epistle, and also by Pseudo-Ignat. ad Philipp. c. 15). Polycarp (ad Philipp. c. 4, 5) treats in succession of wives, widows, young men, and virgins, which may be taken as an indication that virgins had not as yet acquired the distinct status which they ultimately had; nor do they appear to have had such a status at the time when the earlier books of the Apostolical Constitutions were written; nor is there any certain evidence of their being regarded as a distinct "ordo" until the 4th century. This order of "holy virgins," or "church virgins" (παρθένοι ἅγαι or ἐκκλησιαστικάι), is found at Jerusalem (Sozom. H. E. 2, 2; Socrat. H. E. 1, 17), where the empress Helena assembled them and waited on them at supper; in Persia (Sozom. 2, 11, 12); at Alexandria, where Constantine writes, after the death of Arius, to the "clerks and holy virgins," enjoining quietness (ibid. 2, 31); and at Nicomedia (ibid. 8, 23). Their existence is also implied in the fact that Constantine directed provincial governors to make an annual provision for them as well as for widows (Incert. Auct. de Constant. ap. Haenel, Corpus Legum, p. 196). The extent of their existence may be measured by the violence of the Arian reaction against them; whatever was prized by the Catholic party was profaned by the Arian party; and this comparatively new institution of an order of holy virgins seems to have excited an especial spirit of antagonism. The indignities to which the virgins were subjected are mentioned by many contemporary writers, e.g. St. Athanas. Epist. Encycl. c. 3, Apol. ad Constant. Imp. c. 33; Socrat. H. E. 2, 28; S. Hilar. Pictav. ad Constant. Aug. i. 6, and Fragm. Hist. 2, 3; 3, 9, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. x, pp. 561, 633, 665; S. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 33 in laud. Basil. M. c. 46, p. 805; and Orat. 33, c. Arianos, c. 3, p. 605. A similar inference may be drawn from the pagan reaction under Julian; that part of that reaction was directed against this institution of virgins is clear from S. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 4; c. Julian. c. 87, p. 121, and Sozom. H. E. 5, 5, who mentions that Julian went so far as to require virgins and widows who, under the regulation of Constantine, had received allowances from the state to refund them. After this time the references to them are frequent. Basil (Epist. Canon. 2 ad Amphilocho. c. 18) and Cyril of Jerusalem (Cateches. 4, 24, p. 64) speak of τὸ τάγμα τῶν παρθένων; and, probably about the same time, the spurious epistles of Ignatius speak of τὸ σύστημα τῶν παρθένων (ad Philipp. c. 15) and exhort Christians to honour them as consecrated to Christ (ad Tars. c. 9). As an "ordo" or class they were τὸ τάγμα τῶν παρθένων (S. Basil, Epist. Canon. 2, ad Amphilocho. c. 18; S. Cyrill. Hierosol. Cateches. 4, 24, p. 64; so, probably about the same time, τὸ σύστημα τῶν παρθένων Pseudo-Ignat. ad Philipp. c. 15. As individuals, they were, like the Virgin Mary who was constantly held before them in their pattern, "handmaids of the Lord" (δοῦλη τοῦ Θεοῦ on a tombstone at Smyrna, A.D. 540; Corpus Inscr. Graec. no. 9277; cf. ibid. nos. 9286, 9324, 9448; so in the West "puella Dei," 1 Conc. Tolet. c. 6).

It is not clear by what external signs the vow of virginity was indicated in the first three centuries. There is no mention of any special ceremony, and the fact of Cyprian writing an exhortatory treatise, De Habitu Virginitatis, in which he urges those who had taken such a vow to have nothing to do with worldly ornaments ("quid istae cum terreno cultu et cum ornamentis," c. 5), shews that as yet there was no special dress. But in the course of the fourth century two external signs of the vow came to be adopted, the wearing of a dark-coloured dress, and the ceremony of being vested with a veil. The first of these was but partially adopted in the time of Jerome: "solent quaedam cum futuram virginem sponderint pulla tunica eam induere et furvo opere pallio, auferre linteamenta; . . . aliis vero e contra videtur" (S. Hieron. Epist.

128 (98) ad Gaudent. vol. i. p. 961, ed. Vallars. c. cf. id. Epist. 107 (57) ad Letam. c. 5, vol. i. p. 683; Epist. 24 (21) ad Marcellam. vol. i. p. 129). A few years later Leo the Great speaks of "virginitatis propositum atque habitum," as though by that time the adoption of a special dress had become usual (S. Leon. M. Epist. 167 ad Rustic. Narbon. c. 15, vol. i. p. 1426). Such a change of dress was not only a voluntary act, but was not necessarily attended by any special ceremony: a Spanish council of the seventh century forbids any who have adopted it to return to the secular life (10 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 656, c. 5), but this stern rule does not appear elsewhere, and the fact of its being enacted and of the severe penalties by which it had to be enforced, shews that it had not up to that time been universally recognised even in Spain. The second mark of the adoption of a vow of virginity seems to have arisen out of the metaphor which is found as early as the time of Cyprian (e.g. Epist. 4 (62), p. 472, ed. Hartel), and which is treated as a common expression by Athanasius (Apol. ad Constantin. Imp. c. 33), that a girl who had vowed virginity was a "bride of Christ." The poetry of the metaphor (which survives e.g. in Methodius, Conviv. Dec. Virg. Orat. 11, c. 1, p. 207, where the virgins sing a hymn with the beautiful refrain, νυμφίε, παντῶν σοι) was translated into visible acts. The virgin was publicly vested with the bridal veil ("flammeum Christi," S. Hieron. Epist. 147 (93) ad Sabiniā. vol. i. p. 1090; Epist. 108 (86) ad Eustoch. vol. i. p. 723). This was a solemn and irrevocable act. It could only be performed (a) by a bishop, and (b) apparently, on a great festival; for the latter point, cf. Ambros. Exhort. Virgin. c. 7, vol. ii. p. 288, "venit paschae dies, in toto orbe baptismi sacramenta celebrantur, velantur sacrae virgines;" Gelasius, Epist. ad Episc. Lucan. = Decret. General. c. 14, ap. Hinschius, p. 652, allows Epiphany, Easter, or the Nativity of an apostle; for the former point cf. S. Hieron. Epist. 130 (97) ad Demetriad. vol. i. p. 976, scio quod ad imprecationem pontificis flammeum virginalium sanctum operuerit caput; the absolute restriction of the veiling of a virgin to a bishop belongs to an African council of uncertain date, 2 Conc. Carthag. c. 3, and to later times, 2 Conc. Hispal. A.D. 618, c. 7, Conc. Rotom. A.D. 650, c. 9, 6 Conc. Paris. A.D. 829, lib. i. c. 41, 43, in all of which presbyters are prohibited; Caroli M. Capit. Aquisgran. A.D. 789, c. 75, prohibits abbesses; on the other hand 3 Conc. Carth. c. 36, allows presbyters to act with the consent of the bishop. The reason for this restriction to bishops was probably the desire to uphold the dignity of the profession of chastity; it was fitting that the "sanctiores purioresque hostiae," who were thus offered upon the altar of God, should be offered "per summum sacerdotem" (Epist. ad Claudianum sororem de Virginitate, c. 1, ascribed erroneously to Sulpicius Servius, and printed by Halm as an appendix to his works in the Vienna Corpus Script. Lat. vol. i.).

The act of veiling came to be accompanied with ceremonies. Basil speaks of the vow being taken "before God and angels and men, the venerable gathering of clergy, the holy band of virgins, the assembly of the Lord and the church of the saints" (S. Basil. Epist. 46 (5) ad Virg. Laps. p. 136). Augustine seems to imply that there was a feast (Epist. 150 ad Prob. et Julian. ap. Migne, P. L. vol. xxxiii. 645, "velationis apophoretum gratissime accepimus," but the expression may be metaphorical). The treatise De Lapsu Virginis consecratae, c. 5 (sometimes ascribed to Ambrose, and printed in his works, vol. ii. p. 305; more recently, on the strength of an Epinal MS. of the eighth century, ascribed to Nicetas, bishop of Romaciana in Servia; see De Lisle, Comptes Rendus de l'Académie des Inscriptions, 1877, p. 274), gives a vivid account of the ceremonies which had taken place when the lapsed (i.e. married) sister had taken her vow "in tanto tamque solemnī conventu ecclesiae Dei [sc. at Easter], inter lumina neophytorum splendida, inter candidatos regni coelestis quasi Regi nuptura processeras;" the epithalamium of Solomon, Psalm xlv., had been sung over her; and the prayers of the assembled people in their shouted "Amen" had been, as it were, her spiritual dowry. The earliest of the later rituals is probably that of the Missale Francorum ap. Muratori Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. iii. p. 460, which for the most part coincides with the Leonine Sacramentary, ibid. vol. i. p. 719, the Gelasian Sacramentary, ibid. vol. ii. p. 222, and the Gregorian Sacramentary, ibid. vol. ii. p. 786; the ritual of Hittorp's Ordo Romanus, p. 141, contains the same prayers with others, and with some rubrical directions; that of the Codex Maffieianus (Muratori, vol. iii. p. 103) is different.

There was the further distinction between those who had "changed their dress" and those who had "taken the veil," that for the latter there was a limit of age. Basil (Epist. Canon. 2 ad Amphilocho. c. 18) allows it at the age of sixteen or seventeen. Ambrose mentions that in his time there was a controversy whether the veiling of virgins should not be deferred until they were of mature years, and decides that it is a question of sobriety of character and not of lapse of time (S. Ambros. de Virginitate, c. 7, vol. ii. p. 223). But in the course of the fifth century the civil law disallows the veiling of virgins until they are forty years old, and enacts that any one who causes a virgin to be veiled before that age is to be fined a third of his goods (Novell. Majorian, tit. 6, c. 1, § 1, 2, A.D. 458, ed. Haenel, p. 306; so Conc. Caesar-august. A.D. 381? c. 8). The council of Agde (A.D. 506 c. 19) and the Liber Pontificalis (Vit. S. Leon. M. p. 67) fix a still later period, viz., that of sixty years of age; but the African code (Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 16) and in later times the Carolingian capitularies (Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 46, ap. Pertz, M. H. G. Legum, vol. i. p. 74, Hludowici I. Capit. Aquisgran. A.D. 817, c. 26 ap. Pertz, M. H. G. Legum, vol. i. p. 209) fix the age at twenty-five. Later canonists made a distinction between (1) the "velum professionis," which might be taken at twelve years of age; (2) "velum consecrationis" at twenty-five; (3) "velum ordinationis" at forty; (4) "velum praelationis" at sixty; (5) "velum continentiae," which was proper to widows, and for which no age is specified (Silvester Prieras, i.e. Mazolinus, Silvestrina Summa, s.v. Consecratio, ed. Antwerp, 1581, p. 173; Durandus, Rationale, ii. 1, 45, puts these in a different order).

In order to protect the virginity of those who had taken the vow arose the custom of secluding them. The custom existed as early as the time of Tertullian, who speaks of it as one which prevailed in some churches of both Greece and Africa (de Veland. Virg. c. 2). The first mention of special houses in which such virgins lived together is in the middle of the fourth century; Eleusius was banished by Julian for having founded παρθενῶνας at Cyzicus (Sozom. H. E. v. 15); Basil is said to have founded παρθενῶνας (S. Gregor. Naz. Orat. 43 in laud. S. Basil. M. c. 62, vol. i. p. 817); and Ambrose speaks of a "sacrarium virginittatis" as existing at Bologna (de Virginitibus, i. 10, vol. ii. p. 160). In these houses an organization prevailed; Sozomen (H. E. 8. 23) speaks of the virgin Nicarete, whom he praises as the best woman he ever knew, as having refused frequent solicitations to preside over the church virgins; and of Matrona as having been τῶν ἱερῶν παρθένων ἡγουμένη; so also Athanasius in his life of the monk Anthony speaks of his sister as having been placed early in life in a παρθένων, where she afterwards became καθηγουμένη τῶν ἄλλων παρθένων (S. Athanas. Vit. S. Anton. c. 2, 54, vol. i. pp. 634, 668).

Ultimately this seclusion became the rule; those who vowed virginity, whether they had merely "changed their dress" and were "professae," or whether they had received the veil and were "velatae," or "consecratae," lived in monasteries and were nuns. For their history and organization reference must be made to other articles (NUN; MONASTERY).

A virgin who married after taking a vow was subject always to censure, and sometimes to penalties. Cyprian spoke of such an one as "non mariti sed Christi adultera" (de Habitu Virgin. c. 20 and Epist. 4 (62), ed. Hartel, p. 476), and the phrase was often repeated, e.g. by Basil, Epist. 46 (5) ad Virginem lapsam, p. 138; but Augustine repudiates it, and will not allow that marriage after a vow of continence is adultery (de Bono Viduitatis, c. 10). Leo the Great treats it as a case of "praevaricatio" or double-dealing (Epist. 167 ad Rustic. Narbon. c. 15); but both Jerome (adv. Jovin. lib. i. 15, vol. ii, p. 258, ed. Vallars.) and Gelasius (Epist. 9, ad Episc. Lucan. c. 22) apply to it the stronger term "incest." The civil law made marriage with a dedicated virgin penal; Constantinus in 354 (Cod. Theodos. 9. 25, i.) enacted a severe penalty upon those who made attempts on the chastity of virgins, whether with or without their consent; ten years later Jovian, in the counter-reaction against what had happened under Julian, went so far as to enact that even the solicitation of a virgin or widow, willing or unwilling, was not merely penal but capital (Cod. Theodos. 9. 25. 2, Sozom. H. E. 6. 3); but the enactment, though preserved in Cod. Justin. 1. 3. 5, probably failed from excessive severity, since in 420 Honorius and Theodosius imposed the milder, though still severe, penalty of confiscation and deportation; but Majorian, Novell. tit. 6. 1. 4, re-enacted the penalty of Jovian, with the addition of confiscation. The Barbarian Codes follow the principle of the Civil Law; the Interpretatio and two Epitomes of the Visigothic Code punish the virgin or widow as well as the man (Lex Romana Visigothorum, ed. Haenel, p. 195); the laws of Luitprand make forfeiture the penalty of marriage even with one who has been dedicated by her parents, or herself taken a vow, without having been veiled (Leges Luitprandi, c. 30, A.D. 723, in Gengler's Germanische Rechtsdenkmäler, p. 556); the Bavarian code makes the penalty for such marriage twice the ordinary composition for the abduction of a married woman (Lex Baiuvariorum i. 11, textus primus, ap. Pertz, Legum, vol. iii. p. 276); in the Frankish domain, Lothair I. simply forbade such marriages (Chlothacharii I. Constitut. c. 8, A.D. 560, Pertz, Legum, vol. i. p. 2); but Lothair II. made even the attempt to marry capital (Chlothacharii II. Edict. c. 18, A.D. 614, Pertz, vol. i. p. 15). The ecclesiastical penalty for virgins who married was excommunication, for a longer or shorter period. The leading enactment of a general council is that of Chalcedon, c. 16; of local Western councils the chief enactments are the following. The council of Elvira A.D. 305, c. 13, condemns them to perpetual excommunication; the first council of Valence, A.D. 374, c. 2, will not admit them to penance until after the lapse of a long time; the first council of Toledo, A.D. 398, c. 16, will not readmit the offender to communion unless she lives, even during her husband's lifetime, a life of continence; the first council of Orange, A.D. 441, c. 28, treats the offence, as Leo the Great had done, as a case of "prævaricatio;" the second council of Arles, A.D. 451, limits the excommunication to those who were above "twenty-five" years of age; the council of Vannes, A.D. 465, c. 4, treats such a marriage as adultery; the council of Lerida, A.D. 523, c. 6, treats it as "stuprum;" the third council of Orleans, A.D. 538, c. 16, treats it as "raptus," and makes the excommunication perpetual: so also the second council of Tours, A.D. 567, c. 20, the first of Mâcon, A.D. 581, c. 12, and the fifth of Paris, A.D. 615, c. 13. So also in Spain; the sixth council of Toledo, A.D. 638, c. 6 directs those who persist in such a marriage to be "banished from all Christian society, so that not even talk be had with them." (The canons seem always to avoid the honourable word for marriage to be used in reference to such cases; but that "rapere" is used not in its ordinary civil sense, but only to cast a stigma upon such marriages is shewn, e.g. by the council of Reims, A.D. 625, c. 23, which implies that the "raptor" sometimes had the king's consent, or was supported by other legitimate authority.

VIRGINS, THE WISE AND FOOLISH.

A curious painting of an arcosolium, in which the part of the parable relating to the wise virgins is unquestionably treated, was found by Bosio in the cemetery of St. Agnes at Rome (Bottari, Scult. e Pitt. &c. tav. cxlviii.). In the centre is a woman in the attitude of prayer, probably intended for the person buried in the tomb, robed in a dalmatic, with two bands of purple down the front. At her feet, representing the soul of the deceased, is a dove with outspread wings, and as if listening for the voice of her mate (Cantic. ii. 10). On the right of this female figure stand the five wise virgins, similarly clad in dalmatics with purple bands, each bearing in her right hand a torch, and carrying in her left by the handle a vessel of oil (St. Matt. xxv. 4). The leader of the five, who is knocking at the door of the room where the feast is going on, has her torch lighted. On the left of the praying figure five other women, also intended no doubt for the wise virgins, are seated at a table on which are two dishes, a flagon, and two loaves.

There is also in the cemetery of Cyriaca, a painting in fresco of the same subject, more fully treated, the foolish virgins being also represented. They are standing on the left hand of the Saviour, easily recognizable by their extinguished torches and down-cast looks. Our Lord, turning to the wise virgins, points out to them the heavenly feast to which they are invited (De Rossi, Roma Sott. p. 76). De Rossi thinks that this fresco, so far unique of its kind, indicates that the tomb is that of a virgin consecrated to heaven; a conjecture deriving much probability from a trustworthy tradition of a convent on the same spot. The sarcophagus under the fresco exhibits on its front face a figure in the attitude of prayer, while two other figures of saints, thought to be intended for SS. Peter and Paul, are drawing back a curtain and ushering the soul into paradise (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. 'Vierges Folles,' &c.). [E. C. H.]

VISITATION. The right of personal visitation appears to have been considered as inherent in every office that conferred authority or imposed responsibility for the maintenance of discipline. Thus it belonged (i) to metropolitans in their provinces. Bingham (Antiquities, ii. c. 16, § 18) thinks that the right of visitation is implied in the ninth canon of the council of Antioch, A.D. 341, which asserts that the metropolitan received the care (τὴν φροντίδα ἀναδέχεσθαι) of all the dioceses in his province. But the wording of the canon, which goes on to assign as a reason that all men who had any business in hand visited the metropolitan city to transact it, seems rather to point to some supreme power of jurisdiction to be exercised in the metropolis itself, as having been in the minds of the framers of the canon (cf. Bracar. II. c. 4; Bruns, Conc. ii. p. 44). Clearer language is employed by the council of Turin, A.D. 401 (Conc. Turinense, c. 2), which, in deciding between the rival claims of the bishops of Arles and Vienne to the office of metropolitan, decrees that each should visit the churches which were contiguous to his own see (eas ecclesias visitet quas oppidis suis vicinas magis esse constituit). The council of Leptina, A.D. 743, or Boniface (Ep. lxx.), decrees that it is the duty assigned by the canons to metropolitans to look into the lives of the bishops of his province and the way in which they discharged their duties. Occasional notices of metropolitan visitations are met with in early writers. Thus Possidonius (Vit. August. c. 8) speaks of Megalium, primate of Numidia, arriving at Hippo in the course of his visitation tour, and Bede (Hist. Eccl. iv. 2) speaks of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, as passing through the whole island, ordaining bishops where they were needed and setting right all things which he found in disorder.

(ii) But the duty of visitation especially belonged to bishops in their dioceses. [BISHOP, p. 232.] The councils were continually laying down rules for the punctual performance of this duty and defining the business to be transacted.

(a) Visitations were to be held yearly in every parish. The council of Lugo, A.D. 569 (Conc. Lucense, Labbe, Conc. t. v. p. 874) orders a new division of the dioceses in Galicia, on the ground that in their present condition they were too large to admit of a yearly visitation. The council of Tarragona, A.D. 516 (c. 8), orders that the bishop should make yearly visitations to provide for the reparation of such churches as had fallen into bad repair. The second council of Braga, A.D. 572, c. i. (Bruns, Conc. ii. 39), orders that the bishop should visit every parish in his diocese, and, on the first day, inquire how the clergy performed their duty, in order that where it was necessary he might instruct those who were ignorant, especially with reference to the canonical rules for the exorcism and instruction of catechumens during the twenty-one days before their baptism. On the second day he was to assemble the people and instruct them in their duties, both as to belief and practice. No express mention is here made of an annual visitation, but it appears implied. Probably the expenses of a visitation extending over two days were found oppressive to the clergy, for the seventh council of Toledo, A.D. 646 (c. 4), enacts, amongst other precautions to prevent extortion, that no bishop shall remain in any parish during his visitation for more than a single day. Probably many parishes were desirous of altogether avoiding the expenses of the visitation, since the council of Merida, A.D. 666 (Conc. Emerit. c. 11), speaks of certain abbots and presbyters who had obtained exemptions (absolutionem) from former bishops, and orders that whenever a bishop arrives for the purpose of visitation he should be received with due honour, and a reasonable provision for expenses. The annual visitation is provided for in the fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 36), which orders that a bishop shall visit each of the parishes in his diocese every year, for the purpose of seeing that the churches are in proper repair; but if he himself is prevented by ill-health or by the pressure of other duties, the visitation might be performed by one of his presbyters or deacons, who should inquire into the condition of the churches and the lives of the clergy. This permission of visiting by deputy appears to have led to abuses, for we find the council of Meaux (Conc. Meldense, c. 29), A.D. 815, speaking in terms of the strongest condemnation of an iniquitous custom (reprehensibilis et damnabilis consuetudo) which had arisen among some bishops, of never, or scarcely ever, visiting in person the parishes under their jurisdiction.

(b) The canons above quoted speak of the objects of the bishops' visitations as consisting chiefly in the inspection of the fabric of the churches, and the maintenance of discipline among the clergy. Other duties were added at a later period. The council of Leptina, above quoted, decrees that the bishop's visitation should be held annually, for the purposes of administering confirmation, instructing the people, inquiring into the morals of the clergy, and searching out and prohibiting all pagan customs. To add weight to his authority in this last duty, it was provided that he should be accompanied by the graphio, or count, who filled the office of "defensor ecclesiae" in his diocese, "Gravione, qui defensor ejus ecclesiae est" (Labbe, Concilia, vi. p. 1534; see Advocatus Ecclesiae, p. 34). The capitularies of Charlemagne, vii. cc. 94, 95, 129, 365 provide that the bishop shall visit every parish in his diocese for the purpose of administering confirmation, of inquiring into the morals of his people, and extirpating any pagan practices that yet lingered among the people, and (Addit. iii. 65) of correcting any oppression or corruption on the part of the nobles or judges. Offenders were first to be reproved and admonished by the bishop, and if this failed to produce reformation to be reported to the emperor.

(c) These visitations appear to have been conducted with large and occasionally extravagant expenditure. Some exceptions are recorded. Severus Sulpitius (Dialog. 2) writes of St. Martin that he went round his diocese clad in a ragged dress and a black cloak and riding upon an ass. Bede (Hist. Eccl. iii. 28) narrates that St. Chad went round his diocese on his feet, especially noting that he visited all the country districts, the farms and villages and castles. But these are evidently noted as exceptional instances. Athanasius, on the other hand (Apolog. ii. § 74), is said to have been invariably attended while on his visitation not only by priests and deacons, but by a considerable number of the laity, "non paucos ex plebe." For the measures taken by later councils to check the oppressions and exactions for which visitations were made the excuse, see PROCURATIONS.

(iii) Archdeacons also had the power of holding visitations, but the practice seems to have been of gradual growth. Isidore of Seville (Epist. ad Ludifred), after defining the ordinary duties of an archdeacon, adds that he investigates in person, "ipse inquirat," the condition of the fabric and ornaments of the churches and other parish matters, and sends his report to the bishop, but notes that this is done by special commission "cum jussione episcopi." Hincmar of Rheims, however, in his Precepts to Archdeacons, c. 1 (Opp. ii. p. 728), speaks of their visits to country parishes, either in his company, or by themselves, as if such visitations were part of their regular duty (see ARCHDEACON, p. 138, and PROCURATIONS).

(iv) The right of visitation appears to have been claimed in some instances by the civil authorities. The council of Châlons (Conc. Cabillon (c. 11) speaks with great indignation of the conduct of certain judges who claimed a right of visitation over all parishes and monasteries subject to episcopal superintendence, and demanded provision for their expenses. Probably this claim arose from the practice above mentioned of associating the civil "defensor ecclesiae" with the bishop, in order to provide for the more effectual suppression of pagan customs. [MISSI DOMINICI.] [P. O.]

VISITATION OF THE SICK. [UNC-TION, p. 2000; VIATICUM.]

VISITATOR. A bishop temporarily appointed to perform the duties of a vacant see, or to act in the place of another bishop when incapacitated by illness or lying under ecclesiastical censure. See INTERCESSOR. An old formula relating to the election of a bishop, quoted by Du Cange from the Spicilegium Acheriense, tom. viii. p. 154, provides that the bishop who had been in charge of the funeral of a deceased prelate ("tumulator") should be the "visitator" of the vacant see, and take charge of the property in or belonging to the church, the appointment to be made by the metropolitan. The council of Riez, A.D. 439 (Conc. Reg. c. 6), orders that in case of the death of a bishop, no other bishop should approach the cathedral church at the time of the funeral, except one from a neighbouring see, who should take charge of the see in the capacity of a "visitator"—"visitatoris vice." The use of the word seems especially to belong to the Western church. It is of frequent occurrence in the writings of Gregory the Great. Thus (Ep. ii. 25) he appoints Leontius to be "visitator" of the see of Rimini in consequence of the ill-health of the bishop, and (l. 15) commands Balbinus, and (l. 51) Felix to go as visitatores to certain churches, mentioning that their chief duty was to provide for the ordination of the clergy. Hincmar of Rheims, in his epistle to the bishop of Laon, expressly claims the right, as metropolitan, of appointing a visitator "to the care of a vacant see (see Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. ii. 2, c. 21, § 9). The word περιοδεύτης is sometimes translated visitator (see Bruns, Canon. note in Conc. Laodic. c. 57), but the offices were essentially distinct. VOLUME. The "roll of a book" (volumen) was composed of leaves of papyrus or parchment, glued, or otherwise fastened, end to end, and rolled, as its name implies, round an axis. Libri and codices, on the other hand, derived their names from the material of which they were formed, and were put together as books are now. Donati (de' Dittici degli Ant. p. 17) gives a drawing of a volume rolled up and fitted with all requisites for use and protection. The fittings of a volume, as seen in a drawing given by Montfaucon, were a stick to roll it on, with a boss or knob at the left hand of the MS., and projecting a little way beyond the right side of it, so as to furnish a handle; a cover of vellum fastened with strings or straps at either end, and a slip of thinner vellum glued on, with the title of the book written on it. Volumes were sometimes called by a name of similar origin, rotulae (Durand. Ration. Div. Off. i. c. 3, n. 11).

I. Among the Greeks and Romans, a volume in the hand was the mark of an orator. Polyhymnia, the muse of rhetoric, is always represented in this way, and the same mark of distinction is given in statues and bas-reliefs to senators and other great men. In the museum of the Vatican there is a statue of Augustus, with a volume in the left hand, and making a rhetorical gesture with the right. Among the early Christians the use of the volume as a symbol seems to have been more general, though apparently always confined to persons of distinction, and its significance more varied and subtle.

1. It was used in representations of the first person of the Trinity. Bottari (Scult. e Pitt. lxxxiv.) gives a drawing of a sarcophagus from the catacombs, in which the Father appears as an old man standing up, with a volume in his left hand, and his right stretched out after the classical manner, and representing an orator towards Moses, whom he is ordering to put off his shoes before he approaches the burning bush.

The hand alone bearing a volume is sometimes met with as a symbol of the Father, as in a bas-relief of the 6th century representing the baptism of Agilulfus, king of the Lombards (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. v.)

2. The patriarchs and prophets of the Old Testament are represented with the volume in hand (Durand, quoted above). Moses appears on sarcophagi thus represented (Bottari, Scult. e Pitt. xlix. et pass.) only when he is striking the rock, which looks as if the volume were intended as a mark of the divine power granted to him to work miracles for the people. In some engravings the volume is not in his hand, but in the space behind his head (Garrucci, Vetri Orn. &c. tav. ii. 10).

3. Our Saviour is almost always represented in mosaics and in the bas-reliefs of sarcophagi with a volume in his left hand. The volume is shewn unrolled (a) when he is addressing St. Peter (as on a great number of sarcophagi), and there is a remarkably clear example of this treatment in the mosaic of St. Constance, thought to be due to the munificence of Constantine (Ciampini, de Sacr. Aedif. tab. xxxii.); the phylactery, which he presents to St. Peter is also shewn unrolled, and inscribed with the words Dominus pacem dat, intended, of course, as the apostle's commission as preacher of the gospel of peace (Eph. vi. 15). (b) Our Lord also bears the volume when he is teaching (Bottari, Scult. e Pitt. &c. cxxxiii.; Allegranza, Sacr. Mon. di Milano, tav. i.), and when he is disputing with the doctors (Airinghi, Roma Subt. i. 579; ii. 213) [DOCTORS, CHRIST WITH THE]; and on this occasion he has a casket at his feet, supposed to contain the books of the Old Testament, to which he may make reference in his discussion. When a miracle is being wrought the volume is always represented rolled up, as in the healing of the man born blind (Bottari, Scult. e Pitt. cxxxvii.); of the paralytic (ib. lxxxviii.); the changing of water into wine (ib. lxxxix.); the healing of the woman with the issue of blood (ib.). But in some representations of the raising of Lazarus (Bottari, Scult. e Pitt. xxxii. xxxvi.) the volume is unrolled, with the probable intention of symbolizing the revelation of the glory of God (St. John xi. 4), and of "life and immortality through the gospel" (2 Tim. i. 10). But, for some reason as yet undiscovered, the volume, which is an invariable accompaniment of a miracle in the sculptures of sarcophagi, does not appear on glass or in the paintings of the catacombs. In the museum of the Vatican there is a beautiful fresco brought from the catacombs exhibiting, as far as is known, the only ancient representation of the Last Supper, and in this the Saviour appears with the rolled-up volume in his hand.

4. Where a volume appears in the hand of St. Peter or St. Paul, it is supposed to represent his own writings; but when, as sometimes on ancient gilded glass, a volume is placed between these two apostles, it is supposed to symbolize the unanimity of these apostles and the identity of the gospel preached by them. The golden crown by which it is generally surmounted is probably intended to indicate its royal origin as the good news of the kingdom of heaven (St. Matt. iv. 23). Mosaics often exhibit these apostles with the volume unrolled and showing extracts from Scripture referring to some remarkable event in their lives; thus, in the apse of the ancient Vatican, St. Peter is represented (Ciampini, de Sacr. Aedif. tab. xiii.) with a phylactery in his hand inscribed with his memorable confession (St. Matt. xvi. 16). In the same mosaic St. Paul appears standing by the seated figure of the Saviour with a volume in his hand, bearing the words "Mihi vivere Christus est" (Philipp. i. 21).

5. The apostles, as a body, are found represented both on mosaics and bas-reliefs with this sign of their commission to preach the gospel (Airinghi, Rom. Subt. passim; Bosio, Rom. Sott. passim; Ciampini, Vet. Mon. t. i. tab. lxvi.), and the Saviour commonly stands in the midst as if he were teaching them (Millin, Midi de la France, p. lix.).

6. In the more ancient monuments bishops, as depositaries of the word, bear the roll in the left hand; but in mosaics (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. xxiv.), diptychs (Paciandi, de Cult. Joan. Bapt. pp. 230-260), and paintings of a later age, a square book richly bound. A representation on glass of the figure of St. Cyprian (spelt Cripranus) from the catacombs has the roll in hand, and, besides, a volume standing on end at the feet (Garrucci, Vet. Ornat. xx. 6). Representations of Justin and Timothy may be cited as instances of similar treatment (ib. xxiv. 3), the latter having always on ancient glass a second volume behind him—a possible allusion to the two epistles addressed to him by St. Paul.

7. Deacons are also represented bearing in the left hand the same badge of their ministry. Buonarrotti (Vet. Ornat. tav. xvi. 2) gives a drawing of St. Lawrence from a glass bearing the volume, and seated between SS. Peter and Paul, who appear to be teaching him.

8. Readers, in token of their office, as readers of the Scriptures to the congregation, always appear with the volume. A gilded glass, given by Buonarrotti (ib. tav. xvii. 2), preserves what appears to be a representation of the ordination of two youths as readers, who both bear the volume in their hands.

9. In some sepulchral monuments, especially bas-reliefs of double sarcophagi, in which the marriage ceremonies of the deceased are commemorated (Bottari, Scult. e Pitt. &c. tav. cxxxvii.; Maffei, Veron. Illust. part iii. p. 54) the bridegroom holds a volume in his hand supposed to be the nuptial contract. Sometimes three or four volumes stand on end at his feet, possibly indicating the various offices or magistracies he may have held. Volumes of this kind are said to have been borne by slaves after patricians at Rome; and when they appear, as they sometimes do, on glass (Buonarrotti, Scult. e Pitt. tav. xxviii.; Garrucci, Vet. Ornat. xxvii. 1), and on the shields and sarcophagi, it is probable that they are merely a mark of the dignity of the person commemorated, as he has almost always, in such cases, the senatorial badge of the broad purple band.

II. Besides these volumes borne in the hand by divers personages and for various reasons, a great many are found on ancient glass (Garrucci, Vet. Ornat. xviii. 5, 6; xvii. i. 5, &c.) to which it is difficult to assign any certain significance. Buonarrotti (tav. xx.) gives a representation of St. Felicitas and her seven sons between two volumes supposed to signify the two volumes of Scripture, for the truth of which martyrs shed their blood; and Bottari (Scult. e Pitt. tav. xix.)

preserves a figure in the attitude of prayer, with two volumes tied together on one side and an eucharistic cup on the other—a symbolism of which the meaning is obvious enough.

III. Although books, as we understand the term, soon began to be used for the reading of the gospel in churches, volumes, strictly so-called, were, for some time, retained for the prayers and ritual of certain ecclesiastical functions. Cardinal Cassanata had some of these volumes of as late a date as the 9th and 10th centuries, containing the forms of the ordination service, the ritual of baptism, of the blessing of the font, and of the paschal candle (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. "Volume"). [E. C. H.]

VOTIVE OFFERINGS, "votiva," "quae sanctis ex voto aut veneratione offerebantur" (Muratori). The custom of bringing offerings to Christian churches in acknowledgment of some signal deliverance from peril or illness or of some other answer to prayer, with the design of perpetuating the remembrance of these divine favours, became widely prevalent in both the Eastern and Western churches at a very early period. While the observance undoubtedly offers a strong resemblance to the same custom as known to pagan antiquity, it was held to be sanctioned by Scripture; e.g. in such passages as Exodus xvii. 4; Ps. cxi. 4. It ultimately became closely associated with the veneration of the tombs and relics of martyrs, whose intercession and aid were frequently implored. Augustine seems to have sought to divest the practice of the superstitious notions with which it was already becoming connected in his time, by pointing out that such offerings, "apud memorias sanctorum martyrum," ought to be looked upon as really offered to God (Serm. 273; Migne, Patrol. xxxviii. 1251).

The same father is the first who distinctly lays down the theory that such offerings must be made in churches. As quoted by Prosper of Aquitaine, he says that the best offering we can make to God is that of ourselves, and as the image of Caesar was to be given to Caesar, so the image of the Deity is to be consecrated to Him. We have however not only to consider what we can offer and to whom, but also where our offering should be made, "quia veri sacrificii extra catholicam ecclesiam non est" (Opera, ed. Migne, x. 1860). It is in harmony with this view that we find the 20th canon of the collection ascribed to the council of Nantes (A.D. 660) forbidding the offering of vows or presenting of candles or any other offering for the restoration of health in any other place except Christian churches: "Nullus votum faciat aut candellam vel aliquod munus pro sanitate sua rogaturus alibi deferat nisi ad ecclesiam Domino Deo suo" (Mansi, Concilia, xi. 59-61; Migne, lxi. 846).

Similar offerings were made by virgins on the occasion of their consecration to the service of the altar, with the prayer that they might be enabled to keep inviolate their vow of virginity. In the ancient Sacramentarium attributed to St. Leo (Migne, lv. 38), we find in the appointed service for such occasions, "Offerimus tibi, Domine, preces et munera." Gregory the Great, in his Liber Sacramentorum, speaks of the relics of a martyr (those of St. Laurentius) as themselves a kind of offering, "votiva martyria" (ib. lxxviii. 1251); and on another occasion, when referring to an instance of a wife who presented offerings at the altar for her husband's recovery from sickness, styles them a "sacrificium" (Dial. iv. 57).

The extent to which the practice prevailed both in the East and in the West in the 5th century, is sufficiently proved by two writers—Theodoret and Paulinus of Nola. Of these, the former, in a remarkable passage, exultingly describes the honours paid to the tombs of the martyrs in his time—and the tombs themselves as objects of universal admiration, splendidly adorned, and radiant in every part. "To these," he says, "we repair not once or twice a year, or five times only, but frequently and in great multitudes (πανηγύρεις), addressing often, each day, hymns to Him who is their Lord. And those who are in health pray that their health may be preserved; those in sickness, for relief from their malady; the childless, for children; the barren women, for offspring; while those already thus blessed, pray that their sons and daughters may be endowed with desirable gifts." He then goes on to describe some of the offerings (ἀναθήματα), as consisting of models of arms, legs, eyes, &c., according to the affected part, and fashioned out of gold, silver, or wood—"for the Lord," he says, "accepts both small and costly gifts, estimating them by the capacity of the giver." He describes other offerings (probably tablets) as recording the virtues of the martyrs, "but their virtues," he says, "prove that He who was their God was the true God,"—ἡ δὲ τούτων δύναμις τὸν τούτων Θεὸν ἀληθινὸν ἀποφαίνει Θεόν (Græccarum Affect. Curat.; Migne, Pat. Graec. lxxxiii. 922). At the council of Lestines (A.D. 743) the offering of models, such as those which he describes, was condemned as a pagan usage (see PAGANISM, III. ii.).

The references to the practice in Paulinus give evidence of a still more superstitious conception of its efficacy. He describes in his fourteenth poem (de S. Felice Natalitium Carm. iii.) the assembling throngs and the donors as hanging their votive offerings to the pillars of the church. He then proceeds to narrate three stories, which enforce the necessity of faithfully observing such vows. The first is that of an inhabitant of the town of Abellina, who, having vowed a pig to St. Felix, brought his offering to the shrine of the saint, but endeavoured to evade the genuine performance of his vow by killing the pig and simply giving the entrails to the poor of the church, himself carrying off the carcase. On his journey home, however, he was thrown from his horse, and smitten with apparent paralysis, but having been carried back to the church, he there implored the forgiveness of the saint, and ordered the whole carcase to be divided among the poor. Whereupon he was miraculously restored to the complete use of his limbs and to his former health (Migne, lxi. 439-501).

The second instance is that of some peasants of Apulia, who, having reared a fat sow and dedicated it to the same saint, proceeded to drive it to the church. The animal however succumbed to the fatigue of the journey, and was unable to proceed. Full of anxiety lest they should seem unfaithful to their vow, the pious peasants hastened to select one or two pigs of a smaller size, and with these as an offering presented themselves at the church, where to their astonishment they found the sow, which had been miraculously conveyed thither before them.

According to the third story, a heifer had been similarly dedicated to St. Felix from its birth, and when the time came the owner proceeded to yoke it to the cart, when it broke away and escaped. On arriving at the temple however the owners found the animal standing, a seemingly voluntary victim, at the altar of the saint.

VOWS (εὐχή, "votum"). "If in Scripture a vow is usually termed εὐχή, being designated as a prayer, we must understand more especially that kind of prayer which we offer when making a vow, i.e. πρὸς εὐχὴν. But all things which we offer to God are vowed, and most of all the offering of the holy altar, wherein is implied the greatest of all our vows, whereby we vow to be in Christ, as members of His body" (Augustine, Ep. lix., ad Paulinum).

The earliest example of a Christian vow, a proceeding derived from Old Testament precedent, is that recorded of St. Paul in Acts xviii. 18,—εἶχε γὰρ εὐχὴν. Hegesippus (Eusebius, H. E. ii. 25) implies that James the Just was under a similar vow. The tendency in the church, after the 3rd century, would seem to have been at once to encourage the practice of making vows and to attach an increased, and it would seem an exaggerated, importance to their observance. While Cyprian (Epist. iv.), for example, advises young women who feel themselves unable to preserve their vow of virginity, to marry, the 19th canon of the council of Ancyra (A.D. 314) speaks of such vows as of perpetual obligation, and affirms that those who break their vow of virginity might as well commit bigamy,—τὸν τῶν διγάμων ὅρον ἐκπληροῦτωσαν (Mansi, Conc. ii. 520). Similarly Fulgentius, in his treatise de Fide, lays it down that vows of chastity are of perpetual obligation on both sexes (Migne, Patrol. xl. 769).

Among the principal causes of the tendency above referred to, may be named the increased disposition to assert the superiority of the clergy to the laity, the special sanctity with which it was sought to invest the profession of the monk or the anchorite, the veneration of martyrs and of their relics, and, at a later period, pilgrimages to shrines and masses for the dead. The attacks directed against these new theories and practices by such writers as Aërius, Jovinian, and Vigilantius being recognised as just by the teachers of the church only so far as they applied to excesses and abuses, the theory of the vow with which each was associated seems to have been left untouched, and the lawfulness or expediency of taking vows, under certain conditions, appears never to have been called in question. Ambrose, for example, has a warning against vows, but it is only against such as He to whom they are made could not be expected to approve,—“quod sibi cui promittitur nolit exsolvi” (de Officiis, iii. 12). The Apostolical Constitutions recognise with approval the taking of vows of virginity, simply advising that they should not be hastily assumed (bk. iv. 14; Cotelerius, i. 302).

Vows were distinguished as (1) “vota personalia,” or those applying mainly to oneself,

(2) as “vota realia,” or those having reference to external objects and circumstances; they were also distinguished as “perpetua” and “temporalia,” or vows taken for a specified time. Among the “vota personalia” the most common were those of abstinence, chastity, and fasting. Hilary of Poitiers says, “Deo vovenda sunt contemptus corporis, castitatis custodia, jejunii tolerantia” (Migne, ix. 184). Augustine urges Christians not to be backward in taking vows, for they will not, he says, be sufficiently inspired by their unaided strength,—“Non sitis pigri ad vovendum; non enim viribus vestris implebitis.” He enumerates as ordinary vows in his time, those of married people of conjugal fidelity to each other or of abstinence from sexual intercourse with each other, of the wealthy to extend hospitality to all religious persons approaching their houses, of others, to give all their property to the poor, and take upon themselves the religious life (in Ps. lxxvi.).

The most common form of vow in the earlier centuries would appear to have been that of virginity. Those who assumed this vow had their names entered in records kept by the church, and certain other formalities were observed, calculated to render the ceremony more impressive (Socrates, H. E. i. 13; Chrysost. de Sacerd. iii. 16). The binding nature even of the personal vow was not only insisted upon by the church but sometimes enforced by the law. Thus the 15th canon of the second council of Tours (A.D. 567) invoked the assistance of the law to impose divorce on a monk who had so far violated his monastic vow as to marry,—“etiam judicis auxilio separatur” (Mansi, ix. 760). Generally, however, the non-observance of such vows was a matter to be brought before the episcopal courts, and the bishop was held to have the power of mitigating the penalty according to circumstances (council of Chalced. can. 16; Mansi, viii. 378). As regards the “vota realia,” the reader may consult the comments of Ulpian in the Digest (fr. 2, D. 50, tit. 12 de Pollicit.).

Vows appear to have been frequently taken at the tombs of the martyrs, and Eusebius speaks of this as a common custom in his time,—Ὁθεν καὶ ἐπὶ τὰς θήκας αὐτῶν ἔθος ἦν μὲν περιεῖναι, καὶ τὰς ἐνθάς παρὰ ταυταῖς ποιεῖσθαι (Praep. Evang. xiii. 7).

The vow, like the votive offering, was held to be of no efficacy unless taken in a church and accompanied by the observance of certain religious rites. Thus Hilary of Poitiers, when commenting on Ps. lv. (liv.) 1, says that vows are of use only when invested with this character, and that it is only when they are thus offered that the intercession of the Holy Spirit can be looked for in our behalf: “Vota enim tantum ecclesiasticae religionis utilia sunt. Quae cum et dignis Deo cautionibus et propositae in ecclesia observantiae studio probabantur, tum digni erimus pro quibus Deum Sanctus Spiritus interpellat” (Migne, ix. 184). WANTI. [GLOVES.]

WAR. The question of the lawfulness of war, as it presented itself to the early church, assumed a twofold character: (1) whether a Christian prince could rightfully embark in any war; (2) whether a Christian subject was bound to render military service. On both points the decisions of successive teachers of the church exhibit a material difference, a difference mainly to be explained by the altered relations of the church to the civil power.

During the first three centuries the consideration of both the above questions was necessarily complicated by the facts, that the soldier in the Roman legions would be compelled to bear arms in the service of a state professedly pagan, and that military service was closely conjoined with the ceremonial of pagan worship. Hence to both questions the more austere teaching of the church rejoined with an unqualified negative, and the words of Christ (Matt. xxvi. 52) were adduced as placing the matter beyond dispute.

If, as some critics maintain (Hefele, Beiträge, i. 21), the language of Justin (Apol. i. 14) and of Athenagoras (Legatio pro Christ. c. 35) does not necessarily imply a general disapproval of the profession of the warrior, the writings of Tertullian, both before and after his conversion to Montanism, contain passages which are sufficiently explicit. "There can," he says (with allusion to ordinary military service) "be no harmony between the divine and the human oath, the standard of Christ and of the devil, the camp of light and the camp of darkness; one soul cannot be claimed by two masters,—by God and by the devil" (de Idol. c. 19). His treatise, de Corona, called forth by the incident of the Christian soldier who refused to adorn himself with the laurel wreath associated with pagan observances, is well known. He there declares that merely to wear the wreath alone constitutes an act of idolatry—"Ita et corona idolothytum efficitur" (de Corona, c. 10). As for the military profession itself, "Can it," he asks, "be lawful to handle the sword, when the Lord Himself hath declared that he who uses the sword shall perish by it? Shall the child of peace engage in battle, when he looks upon even the strife of the law-courts as unseemly? Shall he who avenges not even his own wrongs, consign others to prison and to chains, torture and punish them?" (ib. c. 11). In the same spirit the martyr Maximilian (circ. A.D. 295) says, "Mihi non licet militare, quia Christianus sum" (Ruinart, Acta Martyr. ii. 209). So again Clemens of Alexandria (i. p. 289) asserts that they who seek peace have no need of the sword or the bow.

The opinion of Origen is less distinctly pronounced. In two passages (adv. Cels. v. 33; vii. 26) he appears to support the view of Tertullian, and in a third (ib. viii. 73) he puts forward the theory that Christians, as a race professedly devoted to the service of God, cannot justly be called upon to bear arms. The pagan priests, he urges, are exempt from such service, and, on like grounds, Christians claim a similar immunity. "We could not fight under the emperor," he says, "even if he should seek to constrain us; but we fight for him when in our own camp (Ἰδιον στρατόπεδον εὐσεβείας) we offer up prayers on his behalf" (Migne, Patrol. Græc. xi. 797). This argument, it is to be noted, appears as a rejoinder to certain criticisms of Celsus, who, in the opinion of Gibbon (ed. Milman and Smith, ii. 189) had exposed a weak point in the Christian theory: "the pagans very frequently asked, what must be the fate of the empire, attacked on every side by the barbarians, if all mankind should adopt the pusillanimous sentiments of the new sect?" Lactantius condemns war on purely philosophic grounds. The aim of the wise man, he says, should be not to engage in combat, the issue of which must always be doubtful, and thereby to annihilate ("tollere") his foe, but to do away with the cause of disagreement itself (Div. Inst. vi. 18). Origen himself, in a fourth passage, appears to allow that defensive war is justifiable, and somewhat quaintly suggests that the mode in which bees carry on their wars may perhaps serve as an example πρὸς τοὺς δικαίους καὶ τεταγμένους πολέμους (adv. Cels. iv. 82).

It is tolerably certain, indeed, that whatever may have been the prevalent theory of the church during the first three centuries, many Christians at that period served in the armies of the empire. Tertullian's own expressions, "vestra omnia implevimus, urbes, insulas, castella, municipia, conciliabula, castra ipsa" (Apol. c. 37); "navigamus et nos vobiscum militamus" (ib. c. 42); and the story which he tells of the "legio fulminatrix" (ad Scapulam, c. 4), are decisive evidence to this effect. We find again from Eusebius (H. E. viii. 4, x. 8) that in the time of Diocletian the number of Christian soldiers was considerable, and that many officers were consequently called upon by the emperor to choose between a return to paganism and degradation from their posts.

The important evidence afforded by Christian inscriptions might, it is true, seem at first sight to contradict these statements. Aringhi (Antiq. Christianae, i. 430) gives an epitaph of a soldier of the time of Hadrian, and (ii. 170) that of a soldier in the praetorian guard; Boldetti (Osservazioni sopra i cimiteri, &c., p. 432), one of a VETERANUS EX PROTERIORIBUS (? "protectorioribus"), and also (p. 415) one "Pyrrho militi," and (p. 416) that of one who is described as "felicissimus miles." Marangoni (Act. S. Viet. p. 102) gives us that of a centurion, and Ruinart (Act. Mart. i. 50) that of two brothers, Getulius and Amantius, who were military tribunes under Hadrian. Le Blant, with the view of arriving at a more precise estimate of the evidence thus afforded, has been at the trouble to compare the results exhibited in three collections of pagan inscriptions taken from three distinct localities (Reinesius, Syntag. Inscript. Antiq.; Steiner, Cod. Inscript. Rom. Rhœni; Mommsen, Inscript. Regni Neapol.) with the Christian inscriptions contained in Séguier (Inscript. Antiq. Index). This comparison has shewn that while the pagan epitaphs give, out of an aggregate of 10,050, as many as 545 as those of soldiers, or an average of 5·42 per cent., the Christian epitaphs, amounting to 4734 in number, contain only 27, or about 0·57 per cent. He offers, however, what may be accepted as a reasonable explanation of this disparity, and a sufficient solution of the apparent incompatibility with the historical evidence. The early Christians, he considers, accepted military service much as they did the institution of slavery, namely as a political necessity. As, however, the Christian slave would not suffer the fact of his earthly servitude to be recorded on his tomb, because he regarded himself as first of all SERVUS DEI, as the Christian soldier, who was first of all MILES CHRISTI, shrank from recording in his epitaph that he had been the soldier of man (Le Blant, Inscript. Chrét. de la Gaule, i. 81-87).

As soon, however, as Christianity received the recognition of the state, much of this early scrupulosity began to disappear. The ✠ inscribed by Constantine on his standard, and the subsequent appearance of the Cross on the imperial eagles, mark the commencement of this change. Some difficulty is indeed presented in the fact that the 13th canon of the council of Nicaea (if we accept the version of Rufinus) imposes thirteen years' penance upon those who, having abandoned the military confession, were induced again to embrace it: "Qui vero propter confessionem militiam abjecerant, et rursum ad hanc abierunt, hos tredecim annis poenitentiam gerere," etc. (Mansi, Conc. ii. 703). Hefele, however, maintains that this canon is to be taken in immediate connexion with that by which it is preceded, and that it refers only to the soldiers under the emperor Licinius, who as Christians resigned their posts rather than take part in pagan sacrifice, but subsequently from mercenary motives returned to the ranks and paid the required homage to the pagan gods (Beiträge, i. 22; Conciliengesch. i. 399).

St. Basil, again (Epist. 188, ad Amphilochem), says that soldiers, after their term of military service has expired, are to be excluded from the sacrament of the communion for three whole years. But Hefele (Beiträge, i. 23) interprets this as referring only to those whose hands had been actually imbued in the blood of their fellow beings. He looks upon the passage also as conveying rather an expression of opinion on the part of the writer than an express injunction, and maintains that it does not imply that St. Basil held all war to be unjustifiable.

Chrysostom nowhere actually condemns the soldier's calling, although (Hom. in Matt. 61, c. 2) he laments the temptations to violence and the indulgence of the passions to which soldiers are exceptionally exposed.

But by far the most explicit and authoritative declaration on the subject is to be found in the writings of Augustine. In his letter to Marcellinus (Epist. 138), he says that if Christianity demanded the condemnation of all warfare, the soldiers in the New Testament seeking for a knowledge of salvation would have been directed by our Lord to throw aside their arms and altogether renounce their profession; whereas the advice he gave them was to be content with their wages, &c.; and "quibus proprium stipendium sufficere debere praeceptum, militare utique non prohibuit" (Migne, xxxiii. 532). In the same letter he says that as a father sometimes severely chastises the son whom he loves, so, in dealing with different nations, the Roman power may be compelled to consider what is for their benefit rather than what they would themselves desire—"quorum potius utilitati consulendum est quam voluntati" (ib. xxxiii. 531). Elsewhere he says that ambuscades and other deceptive stratagems are quite legitimate in war (Quaest. in Hept. bk. vi.; Migne, xxxiv. 781). He draws also a distinction which subsequently became classical, between just and unjust wars. In the former class he includes wars undertaken to obtain redress for wrongs; as, for instance, when a neighbouring state has neglected to make reparation for injuries inflicted by any of its citizens, or to make restitution of property wrongfully seized. A war entered upon for the purpose of chastising the undue arrogance of another state,—"ad subjugandam mortalium superbiam,"—may even be looked upon as entered upon "Deo auctore" (cont. Faust. c. 75; Migne, xlii. 447). A Christian man may fight even under a sacrilegious king, provided that what is enjoined upon him personally is not "contra Dei praeceptum" (ib.). Augustine encouraged Count Boniface in his valiant struggle against the Vandals by the exhortation not to think that "no one who wages war can please God," and cited for his encouragement the examples of king David and Cornelius, the centurion (Epist. 189; Migne, xxxiii. 855).

These and similar utterances of this father would seem to have determined the theory of the church after his time, and it is easy to understand that the views to which he gives expression would be further enforced by the fact that a large proportion of the wars of Christendom were carried on against the pagan or the infidel, as, for example, those against the Lombards, the Saracens, and the Turks, and thus represented a struggle in which the existence not merely of the state but of Christianity itself was in peril. The words in which he seeks to reassure the conscience of Count Boniface are quoted as authoritative by Hinemar (de Regis persona et regio ministerio, c. 10); and the moral distinction which he draws between different kinds of war is reproduced and further elaborated by Isidorus. The latter, in his Etymologiae (bk. xviii.),—the standard authority, after the 7th century, with respect to the relations of the church to secular matters,—distinguishes wars as of four kinds: (1) just; (2) unjust; (3) civil; (4) "plusquam civile." His definition of the first coincides with that of Augustine, to which he adds, "aut propulsandorum hostium causa." Unjust wars he defines as those undertaken from passion and without adequate cause. No war can be just save that which is undertaken for the purposes of inflicting just punishment ("ulciscendi causa") or in order to repel aggression. As an instance of (3) he cites the war between Sylla and Marius; of (4) that between Caesar and Pompey, who were not only "cives" but also "cognati."

The efforts of the church, after the time of Augustine, were mainly restricted to repressing the far from infrequent endeavours of the clergy themselves, in times of special danger and excitement, to participate in the strife of the battlefield. That such service was wholly unbecoming their profession does not appear to have ever been seriously denied. War was always regarded by the church as distinctively the concern of the laity; and Eusebius (Dem. Eccl. i. 8; Migne, Patrol. Græc. xxii. 29-30), in drawing an elaborate comparison between the avocations permissible to the ecclesiastic and to the layman, specifies as among those that belong solely to the latter, the carrying on of just warfare,—τοῖς τε κατὰ τὸ δίκαιον στρατευομένοις. The 74th of the Apostolical Canons requires that any bishop, priest, or deacon devoting himself to military service and aiming at combining it with the duties of his office shall be forthwith degraded from his ecclesiastical rank, on the principle of giving to Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God the things that are God's (Bunsen, Analect. Ante-Nic. ii. 31). The council of Toulouse (A.D. 633) directs that those of the clergy who venture to take up arms "in quacumque seditione" shall be similarly treated and sent to do penance in a monastery,—"in monasterium poenitentiae contradantur" (Mansi, x. 630). At the council of Meaux (A.D. 845) the clergy were forbidden either to engage in military service or even to carry arms, "armati incedere," under pain of deprivation of office as "sacrorum canonum contemptores et ecclesiasticæ sanctitatis profanatores" (ib. xiv. 827).

But notwithstanding these and similar prohibitions, we find pope Nicholas I., in the year 865, remonstrating with Lewis the German and Charles the Bald for allowing many of the Frankish bishops to absent themselves from a synod for the purpose of joining in the defence of the coast against the Northmen,—"Cum militum Christi sit Christo servire, militum vero sæculi, sæculo" (Epist. 83; Migne, cxix. 922).

WASHING. The principal ceremonial ablutions anciently used in the church, besides baptism itself, are: the washing of the heads of the catechumens on Palm Sunday [HOLY WEEK, p. 780], and of their feet, and sometimes of their whole bodies, on MAUNDY THURSDAY [p. 1160]: the washing of the feet of the newly baptized [BAPTISM, p. 164]; the solemn washing of an infant seven days after baptism (Martene, de Rit. Antiq. I. i. 18, Ordo 26); the washing of the hands of those who entered a church for worship and communion, and of the ministrants in the celebration of the holy Eucharist [HANDS, WASHING OF, p. 758; LAVABO, p. 938]. For the ablution of the vessels used in holy communion, so far as it is found within our period, see PURIFICATION OF ALTAR VESSELS, p. 1756.

WATER-VESSELS. HOLY WATER must of course have required some vessel to receive it, and very ancient vessels destined for this use are believed to be still in existence. Boldetti (Osservazioni, p. 16) declares that he had seen in the catacombs certain round vessels of marble, terra cotta, or glass, placed on pillars at such a height as to be easily reached by the hand. Such a pillar, which may have supported a water-vessel, is found at the entrance of an ancient subterranean chapel at Chiusi (Cavedoni Cimit. Chius. p. 20). The well-known palindromic inscription, ΝΙΨΟΝ ΑΝΟΜΗΜΑΤΑ ΜΗ ΜΟΝΑΝ ΟΨΙΝ, which is found on a vase discovered at Constantinople in the last century, and also (in an incorrect form) on one more recently discovered at Autun, is thought to indicate that the vase had been used to hold holy water. There is in the church of SS. Mark and Andrew, in the island of Murano, a well-proportioned urn of Parian marble, brought by the Venetians from Greece, which bears the inscription — ΑΝΤΛΗΣΑΤΑΙ[ε] ΥΔΩΡ ΜΕΤΑ ΕΥΦΡΟΣΥΝΗΣ ΙΟΤΙ ΦΩΝΗ ΚΥ ΕΠΙ ΤΩΝ ΥΔΑΤΩΝ (Isaiah xii. 3; Ps. xxviii. [xxix.] 3). This is also thought to have been a holy water vessel (Paciandi de Balneis, p. 141; figured in Martigny, p. 263, 2nd ed.). Gori (Thes. Diptych. iii. suppl. pl. xxv.) has figured an ivory vessel, bearing in relief the holy family and the four evangelists, which is believed to have been a portable holy water vessel. But perhaps the most curious of all the vessels of this kind which have been discovered is a leaden vessel, from the district of Tunis, bearing the inscription — ΑΝΤΛΗCATE ΥΔΩΡ ΜΕΤ ΕΥΦΡΟCΥΝΗC. Within a border formed partly by the inscription itself, partly by branches of the vine, are two rows of figures. The upper row displays the Good Shepherd between a palm and a gladiator, who takes the wreath of victory from a cippus or low pillar; and a praying figure between a palm and a winged Victory. The lower row shews, twice over, the cross placed on a rock, whence issue the four rivers, at which a sheep and a stag—the Jewish and the Gentile Church—quench their thirst. This vessel is figured in De Rossi's Bulletino, 1867, p. 80, and in Martigny, p. 264. Compare COLYMBION, FOUNTAINS, NYMPHAEUM, PHIALA (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. Eau Bénite).

WEDDING. [MARRIAGE.]

WEEK (in New Testament, σάββατα and σάββατον, in the phrase μία, or πρώτη, σαββάτων or σαββάτου, δευτέρα σ. κ. τ. λ.; ἑβδομάς, hebdomas and hebdomada; septimana, first so used in Cod. Theodos. xv. 5, 5; laterculus septem dierum, Tertull. ad Nat. i. 13). For the measurement and notation of time, the Christian communities, as they formed themselves in the various provinces of the Roman empire, had, in the existing local or national method of "dating," all that was needed for ordinary secular purposes. They had but to retain the received calendar names of day and month, and the current notation of the year expressed in terms of an "era," or by name of consuls, and the like. The requirements of Christian worship brought with them certain modifications of the accustomed method and nomenclature. In every city of the Roman empire, which had a synagogue, Jews, with proselytes, formed the nucleus round which the church grew; and from these the Gentile believers accepted the Jewish week. Already the seven-day week was widely known by Greeks and Romans, but, for the most part, as a measure of time used by astrologers (Chaldean and Egyptian). The Sabbath, as a Jewish institution, was but one of many superstitions imported into Rome from the East. Christian, Jew, and Gentile alike, whether or not they continued to attach any special sanctity to the SABBATH, appear, from the first, to have celebrated the first day of the week in memory of the Lord's resurrection. [LORD'S DAY.]

Names of the Days of the Week.—The names derived from Jewish usage, μία (or πρώτη), σαββάτων (or σαββάτου), δευτέρα, κ. τ. λ., occur in the New Testament; occasionally in subsequent times, e.g. Tertull. has "quarta et sexta sabbati" (de Jejun. 14, and St. Epiph. Haer. lxx. 12). But the first day is almost constantly (ἡμέρα) κυριακή or κυρίον, dies dominicus or dominica; (Dominicum does not necessarily mean "the Lord's day" in Acta Martyr. S. Saturnini, Ruinart, 9, 10: "non potest intermitti dominicum." Comp. Tertull. de Fuga in Persecutione, c. 14: "quomodo dominica sollemnia celebravimus?") ἡ τοῦ κυρίου ἀναστροφῆς (Const. Apost. c. ii. 59); "dies dominicae resurrectionis" (Tertull. de Orat. 23). The numerical designation, ὀγδόη, eighth day, occurs only in mystical expositions, as St. Barn. Ep. 15; St. Iren. de Ogdoad. fragm.; St. Hilar. Praef. in Explan. Psalm. t. i. 7; St. Augustine, Ep. 119 ad Januar. 10-16.

By the close of the 2nd century, we find the Wednesday and Friday distinguished as fast-days (or semijejunia) under the name dies STATIONUM, στάσεις. The Greek names for these days are τετράς and παρασκευή; for the latter Epiph. Expos. fid. § 22, has προσάββατον, as St. Mark xv. 42, παρασκευή ὅ ἐστι προσάββατον; a law of Constantine (Euseb., Vit. Const. iv. 18) terms the parascève πρὸ σαββάτου; the Latin, quarta, sexta sabbati (Tertull. u. s.); more commonly feria quarta and parascève. Comp. Petri Alex. fr. de Paschate, in Routh, Rel. Sac. iii. 343; Constit. Apost. vii. 23. The Greek names most in use for the days of the week are κυριακή, δευτέρα, τρίτη, τετράς, πέμπτη, παρασκευή, σάββατον; the Latin, dies dominicus, feria secunda, f. tertia, f. quarta, f. quinta, parascève, sabbatum. This ecclesiastical use of the term feria is variously explained. [FERIA.] The present writer conjectures that feria secunda, tertia, &c., came into use as Christianized equivalents for the secunda sabbati, &c., objected to as Jewish. Comp. Rösch in Herzog, R. E. Zeitrechnung, t. xviii. 473).

The planetary names, for each day of the week came to the Romans (probably before the Christian era) from Alexandria, as a purely astrological, not a religious institute. The true explanation of these names is undoubtedly this—the second of the two given by Dion Cassius, xxxvii. 18,^a the locus classicus on this subject (see Ideler, Hdb. der Chron. u. s., and ii. 177; Lobeck, Aglaophamus, p. 142, and J. C. Hare, On the Names of the Days of the Week, in the Cambridge Philological Museum, vol. i.), viz. that each of the twenty-four hours of each day, beginning at sunrise, was assigned to one of the seven "planets," taken in the then-received order, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Sun, Mercury, Venus, Moon, continued, without interruption, from day to day. Thus, the first hour at starting of the cycle being that of Saturn, that planet is "regent" of the whole day, the eighth, fifteenth, twenty-second hours being also his; the twenty-third has Jupiter; twenty-fourth, Mars; and the twenty-fifth, or first of the following day, comes to sun, who, therefore, as "regent," gives his name to the day. Thus the twenty-second hour being the sun's, the twenty-third and twenty-fourth fall to Mercury and Venus, and the first hour of the following day to Moon, whence dies Lunae; and so on to the seventh: first hour, Venus. In this astrological scheme, the first day of the week is Saturday. Dion Cass. (u. s.), who says that the practice of naming days after the seven planets, though in his time universally known, "had come in, so to say, but recently," must be understood to speak of its general diffusion. It was certainly known long before his time. "Pompey," he says, "throughout the siege of Jerusalem (B.C. 63) availed himself for his great operations, of the well-known ἄργία of the Jews on the seventh day, and so took the city by the final assault 'on the day of Saturn.'" And by the same name he subsequently calls the day of the taking of Jerusalem by Herod and Sosius (B.C. 37), in both statements clearly identifying Saturn's day with the Jewish seventh day (Browne's Ordo Saeculorum, § 207 sq.). The name, "day of Saturn," may have been Dion's own substitute for a "sabbath" or "seventh day" in the contemporary records relating to Pompey and Sosius. But early in our era, Tibullus (i. 3, 17) clearly identifies Saturday with the supposed inauspicious Jewish sabbath—"Aut ego sum causatus aves aut omina dira, Saturni aut sacram me tenuisse diem" (comp. Ovid, Ars Amat. i. 45: "rebus minus apta gerendis Culta Palaestino septima festa Syro"). Tacitus (Hist. v. 4) says that some imagined the Jews' sabbatical rest to have been in honour of Saturn; Frontinus, in the reign of Nerva (Strateg. ii. 1, 17), that Vespasian reserved his chief assaults upon the Jews for the "day of Saturn," on which it was unlawful for them to do any work. Between this and the time of Dion Cassius, we have Christian testimonies to the application of the planetary names to the days of the Jewish week in Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and his contemporary Clement of Alexandria. Plutarch's Qu. Sympos. iv. qu. 7, is unfortunately lost: according to the heading, its subject was the order of the planetary days, doubtless arising out of the two preceding questions, which relate to the Jewish sabbath. That the planetary week was known, at least to artists, early in our era, is further proved by monuments. In the Pittore di Erculano, iii. pl. 50, is a series of seven heads of planetary deities—Saturn, Apollo = Sol, Diana = Luna, Mars, Mercurius,

^a Ideler (Hdb. der Chron. i. 179), on the warrant of this passage, held that the seven-day week, in connexion with the seven planets, was early known in Egypt. But no trace of such a week, civil, religious or astrological, has been found on Egyptian monuments; the Egyptian week from the earliest times was the decade. Lepsius, Chronologie der Aegypter, p. 131 ff.

Jupiter, Venus, i.e. in the order of the week-days; also an ancient bronze represents the same seven deities, likewise beginning with Saturn (Montfaucon, Antiq. Expl. Suppl. i. pl. 17, p. 37; J. C. Hare, u. s. p. 31).

Early Christian writers use the planetary names, for the most part, only in their apologies and other addresses to the heathen. Thus Justin Martyr, u. s. names the κρονική and ἡ ἡλίου Saturday and Sunday; and Tertull. Apologet. c. 16, "Aequē si diem solis laetitiae indulgemus alia longe ratione quem de religione solis, secundo loco ab eis sumus qui diem Saturni otio et victui decernunt, exorbitantes et ipsi a Judaico more, quem ignorant;" the same matter is more fully expressed in ad Nationes, i. 13. In the Codex also solis dies often occurs, but with expressions of honour attached; thus, in a law of Constantine (Cod. Just. iii. 12, de feriis, l. 3, A.D. 321), "Omnes iudices urbanaeque plebes et cunctarum artium officia venerabili die solis quiescant;" so Cod. Theod. ii. 8, de feriis l. 1 (same year), "diem solis veneratione sui celebrem;" and ibid. viii. 8, l. 3 (A.D. 386), "Solis die quem dominicum rite dixere majores." In addresses to Christians, when the planetary name, Sunday, is used, it is usually with a mystical or allegorical reference to the creation of light on the first day (alluded to in the passages of Barnabas and Ignatius, and clearly expressed in that of Justin Martyr, given above). Compare Leo the Great, Ep. Decret. 81, c. 1), or to Christ as the Sun of Righteousness. So St. Ambrose, Serm. 62: "Dominica nobis venerabilis est atque sollemnis, quod in ea Salvator velut sol oriens discussis inferorum tenebris luce resurrectionis emicuit: ac propterea ipsa dies ab hominibus saeculi Dies Solis vocatur, quod ortus eam Sol Justitiae Christus illuminat." Gregory of Tours (Hist. iii. 15), "Ecce adest dies solis: sic enim barbaris diem dominicum vocitare consuetudo est." Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vii. 12, § 75) finds a mystery also in the planetary names of the stationes: "The true Gnostic knows the aenigmata of the tetras and parasceve, our fasting days: to wit, that these being the days of Hermes and Aphroditē, he shall fast, his life long, for covetousness and carnal lust." The planetary names occur in some Christian calendars, and all through the Fasti Consulares Anonymi, from A. U. C. 246 to 1107, in which to the consuls of each year is appended, together with the moon's age, the week-day of 1st January: e.g. U. C. 1107 [= A.D. 354], "Constantio VII. et Constantio II. Sat. xxi.;" meaning that the 1st January of that year was Saturday (Norisii Opp. xi. 595 sqq.). And even in Christian epitaphs, as in the following (ap. Noris. l. c. 686), of A.D. 457, in which Paschasius is said to have been born, "Dies paschales prid. Non. April. die Jobis," i.e. "in the paschal days, on 4th April, Jupiter's day." By the generality of Christians, however, the use of these heathen names was avoided. Indeed Philastrius (or Philaster), contemporary and friend of St. Ambrose, cir. A.D. 380, in his work De Haeresibus, condemns the use of the planetary names as heretical. Isidore of Seville, A.D. 595 (Etym. v. 30), having explained, for the benefit of the unlearned, that "the first day of the week, the una sabbati of the Hebrews, is with us dies Dominicus, which day the Gentiles have dedicated to the Sun; the 2da sabbati our 2da feria, by them of the world is called dies Lunae," etc. goes on to say, that one does best to comply with the ritus ecclesiasticus by which the days are called feriae; and that if one of the heathen names should chance to escape one's lips, it should be considered that those whose names the pagans have given to the week-days were human beings who, as benefactors of mankind, received divine honours and were translated into the heavens, so that it is no sin if their names do, now and then, happen to be used by us. Comp. Bedae de Temporum Ratione, c. 6.

[H. B.]

When the Latin came to mingle with the Teutonic races, the Latins roughly translated the names of the Teutonic gods by names of deities with which they were familiar (Tacitus, Germ. 9; Ann. xiii. 57; Hist. iv. 64), and conversely the northern tribes found (as they thought) Teutonic equivalents for the names in the Roman Pantheon (Grimm, Deutsche Mythologie, p. 108 ff. 2nd ed.). Hence the days of the week received names which were thought equivalent to their classical planetary denominations. This fact renders it highly probable that the week was adopted by the northern tribes in pre-Christian times; for if it had been received from Christian missionaries, they would scarcely have adopted a nomenclature which tended to perpetuate the names of the very deities whose worship they sought to abolish. Both William of Malmesbury (Gesta Reg. p. 9, ed. Savile, 1601) and Matthew of Westminster (Flores, p. 82) make Hengist say to Vortigern, that the Saxons gave the name of Woden (as equivalent to Mercury) to the fourth day of the week, and of Freya (as equivalent to Venus) to the sixth. Further, the name of Tius or Zio (etymologically connected with Sanscrit Diaus and Greek Zeús) was given, as equivalent to Mars, to the third day; and of Thor or Donar, as equivalent to Jupiter, to the fifth. Saetere or Sater (found in Saxon Saeteresdag, Frisian Saterdei, etc.) seems to be no more than the Teutonic way of writing the Latin Saturnus. Sol and Luna were simply translated into Sun and Moon. Hence arose the Teutonic and Scandinavian names of the days of the week, which are still preserved complete in English, Danish, and Swedish. In modern German Samstag (= Sabbatstag) has displaced Saturday, and Mittwoch Wednesday. In the Romance languages, the first day of the week has a name derived from Dies Dominica (Ital. Domenica, Span. Domingo, Fr. Dimanche), and the seventh day one derived from Sabbatum (Ital. Sabbato, Span. Sabado, Fr. Samedi = Sabbati Dies). The Slavs, Lithuanians, and Finns do not appear to have adopted the planetary names; they simply number the days, making Monday the first day, and consequently Sunday the seventh. (See further in Grimm, D. M. p. 111 ff.) [C.]

The Sunday Letters.—From the earliest times after the introduction of the Julian calendar, we find the first eight letters of the alphabet A—H ranged in unbroken succession against the days of the months, from 1st Jan. to 31st Dec. (monumental calendars collected by Gruter, and by Foggini, are enumerated by Ideler, Handbuch, ii. 135). These letters marked the nundines: viz. on whatever day of January the first nundines fell, the letter of that day marked the nundinal days throughout the year (except in leap year, when after 24th Feb. the letter fell back one place, e.g. from B to A). Familiar as this arrangement must have been to Christians living in or near Rome (or wherever the nundines were in use), it is strange that they did not earlier apply the like arrangement to their ecclesiastical calendars, for marking the Sundays of each year. Yet it is not until some time after the council of Nice that the Sunday letters are first met with, viz. in the calendar of the reign of Constantius, edited by Lambecius in the Bibliothec. Vindobon. t. iv., in which, side by side with the old eight nundinal, are ranged the seven dominical letters, "qua nulla antiquior dominicalium characterum memoria extat," says cardinal Noris (de Cyclo paschali Ravennate, Opp. t. ii. col. 786). See further, EASTER, p. 593. [H. B.]

WHIPPING. (1) For the use of the lash or of rods as a punishment, whether of monks or others, see CORPORAL PUNISHMENT, p. 469.

(2) Whipping was also used as a penitential discipline. Thus it is related of abbat Pardulph (+737), that in Lent he bared his whole body, and commanded his disciple to beat him with rods (Mabillon, Acta SS. Bened. iii. 537). In the Penitential of Cummean (Wasserschleben, Bussordnungen, p. 463) one of the methods of redeeming a year of penance is to receive three hundred strokes of the rod on the bare body. And there are many instances of the use of the lash for penitential purposes in later times.

(3) The discipline of the scourge applied by a man to his own back probably does not fall within our period. For though Gretser (De Spontanea Disciplinarum seu Flagellorum Cruce) claims to have produced proofs of the existence of this practice from writers as early as the fourth century, his proofs are either from spurious writings, or fail to prove the matter in hand. Some of them relate to the beating of the breast [TUNSO PECTORIS] as an indication of penitence, which is a very different thing from whipping (Zöckler, Geschichte der Askese, p. 38 ff.) [C.]

WHITBY, COUNCIL OF (PHARENSE CONCILIIUM), A.D. 664, when the conference mentioned by Bede between Colman, Agilbert, Wilfrid, and others in the presence of king Oswy respecting Easter took place (Mansi, xi. 67-72; Wilkins by Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 100-106). [E. S. Ff.]

WHITE GARMENTS. The white robes, or albs, in which the baptized were clothed as soon as they issued from the baptismal waters, are frequently alluded to by ancient writers. See, for instance, the poem De Resurrectione Domini attributed to Lactantius; Paulinus of Nola, Epist. xii. ad Sever.; Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. Mystag. iv. 8; Ambrose, de Mysteriis, c. 7 [BAPTISM, p. 163]. The conferring of the white robe was accompanied, according to the Gregorian Ordo Baptizandi Inf., by the words: "Accipe vestem candidam et immaculatam, quam perferas sine macula ante tribunal Domini Nostri Jesu Christi."

It was the almost universal custom of the church that the white baptismal robes were worn for eight days, so that when baptisms took place on Easter-Eve the albs were taken off on the first Sunday after Easter, the Dominica in albis depositis. This ceremony appears to have taken place in the sacristy or vestry attached to the baptistery, where they were washed in water blessed for the purpose. What became of them after this is not quite clear. In some cases they seem to have been preserved in the church or by the sponsor; for a certain deacon Muritta (Victor Vitensis de Persec. Vandal. v. 9), produced as a witness against his godchild Elpidophorus, who had fallen into Arianism, the sabana which he had received at baptism. In other cases the baptized person seems to have retained it, for we read that St. Anthony of Egypt, in the prospect of martyrdom, appeared before the judge in his baptismal alb (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. Aube; Suicer's Thesaurus, s. vv. λαμποφορέω, λευχειμονέω; Ménard, note 327 on the Gregorian Sacramentary, p. 356). [C.]

WHITSUNTIDE. [PENTECOST.]

WIDOWS. It is clear that the care of the fatherless and the widow formed in early times an important department of ecclesiastical administration. Among subapostolic writings the Shepherd of Hermas is conspicuous for the prominence which it gives to the subject, repeatedly enjoining it as a Christian duty (Mand. 8, 10; Sim. 1, 8; 5, 3), and contrasting the "pernicious men who, abusing their ministry, plunder widows and orphans" with the good bishops who shelter and protect them (Sim. 9, 26, 2; 9, 27, 2). Ignatius makes it a reproach against certain heretics that they neglected widows and those who were in distress (ad Smyrn. c. 6), and urges Polycarp not to neglect widows, but to make them his especial care (ad Polyc. c. 4). Polycarp himself urges the presbyters of Philippi not to neglect the widow, the orphan, and the poor (ad Philipp. c. 4); and using a metaphor which was not unfrequently repeated, and which is of importance in relation to his conception of the Christian sacrifice, he speaks of widows as being "an altar of sacrifice" (Θυσιαστήριον. Ibid.). In the older dispensation the offerings which were presented to God were offered and partly consumed upon the great altar of the temple court, but under the new dispensation they are distributed among widows and others who were in need (so Const. Apost. 2, 26; 4, 3; Pseudo-Ignat. ad Tars. c. 9; Tertull. ad Uxor. 1, 7). Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 67) places widows and orphans first on the list of those to whom the offerings of Christian assemblies were distributed by their president. The Clementines (Epist. Clement. ad Jacob. c. 8; cf. Const. Apost. 4, 2) make it a primary duty of presbyters to stand towards orphans in the place of parents, and towards widows in the place of husbands. In the earlier books of the Apostolical Constitutions the references are frequent: so great was the care which was taken of widows and so liberal were the offerings which they received, that some of them shamelessly abused their privilege and made their widowhood a profitable trade (ἐργασία, 3, 7, 12, 13: cf. Pseudo-Ignat. ad Philadelph. c. 4).

In order to entitle anyone to receive relief, widowhood seems to have been of itself a sufficient qualification. The number of widows thus relieved was large. Cornelius of Rome, in the middle of the 3rd century, says that at Rome the widows and others who were in distress amounted to fifteen hundred (Epist. Cornel. ap. Euseb. H. E. 6, 43); and Chrysostom reckons the number of widows and virgins who were supported by the comparatively poor church of Antioch at three thousand (S. Chrysost. Hom. in Matt. 66 (67), c. 3, ap. Migne, P. G. vol. lvii. 630).

Of the widows who were thus the objects of care to the church officers, some were formally enrolled on the κατάλογος, or list of church members, as a distinct class or "ordo": (the Clementines, Recogn. 6, 15, Hom. 11, 35, attribute the formation of this "ordo" to St. Peter). But even at the time at which the Pastoral Epistles were written it is clear that restrictions were placed upon admission to that class. It is laid down in 1 Tim. v. 9, 10 that a widow is not to be entered on the church-roll (καταλεγέσθω) "under three-score years old, having been the wife of one man, well reported of for good works, if she have brought up children, if she have lodged strangers, if she have washed the saints' feet, if she have relieved the afflicted, if she have diligently followed every good work." These restrictions seem to have been consistently maintained in the early church. They are elaborately repeated in the Apostolical Constitutions, 3, 1, 5; Origen (in Joann. tom. 32, c. 7, vol. iv. p. 422, ed. Delarue) shews that stress was laid upon every part of them by arguing against too literal an interpretation of the clause "if she have washed the saints' feet," the omission of which, he says, must not be taken to exclude a widow who, in her time of prosperity, shewed hospitality to the brethren in other ways; Tertullian (de veland. Virg. c. 9) shews that the restrictions of age and monogamy were maintained in Africa; and Ambrose implies that they existed in his time in Italy (Exhort. Virgin. c. 4, 23, vol. ii. p. 284, where Juliana of Bologna speaks of herself as being "adhuc immaturam viduitatis stipendiis," i.e. not yet sixty years old; so de Viduis, c. 2, 9, vol. ii. p. 188). There was sometimes the further restriction that a widow must not have children or grandchildren capable of supporting her (Ambrosiast. in Epist. I. ad Timoth. c. 3, in the Append. ad op. S. Ambros. p. 295); but in later times the restriction as to age was sometimes waived (Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 101, "viduae adolescentes quae corpore debiles sunt sumptu ecclesiae ejus viduae sunt sustententur").

The possession of the qualifications which are mentioned in the Pastoral Epistles did not, ipso facto, entitle a widow to a place on the church-roll. She had to be definitely appointed (καθιστάνεσθαι, Const. Apost. 3, 1, Διατ. Κλήμ. 21; κατατάσσεσθαι, Const. Apost. 8, 25; both which words were in ordinary use for the ordination or appointment of clerks; see ORDINATION). It does not appear by whom the appointment was made. Chrysostom (de Sacerdot. 3, 16) counts the selection of fit persons among the burdens of the episcopal office; but there is no evidence that the right of appointment was confined to bishops.

Clement. Recognit. 6, 15, τὸ τάγμα τῶν χηρῶν, Pseudo-Ignat. ad Philipp. c. 15; τὸ χηρικόν. Clement. Homil. 11, 35; Const. Apost. 3, 1; 8, 25) which was thus formed was evidently a small class in each community. One of the earliest collections of ecclesiastical regulations fixes the number at three (Διαταγαὶ Κλήμεντος, c. 21 (24), ed. Pitra, Juris Eccles. Graec. Monumenta, vol. i. p. 84; Lagarde, Juris Eccles. Reliquiae, p. 74; Hilgenfeld, Novum Testamentum extra canonem receptum, fasc. 4, p. 101), but it had ecclesiastical rank (ἐκκλησιαστικὴ τιμὴ, Origen in Joann. tom. 32, 7, vol. iv. p. 422, ed. Delarue), and it is enumerated as co-ordinate with, and therefore distinct from, both clerks and laymen (Const. Apost. 2, 25; 3, 11, 15; 8, 10, 12, 29). Its members were supported out of the church offerings until about the time of the council of Nicaea, when Constantine sent a rescript to provincial governors, ordering that they should for the future receive an annual provision in common with the church virgins "et aliis qui divino ministerio erant consecrati" (Incert. Auct. de Constant. ap. Haenel, Corpus Legum ab Imperat. Romanis ante Justinianum latarum, p. 196). Julian abolished this provision and compelled those who had received it to refund it (Sozom. H. E. 5, 5), but his successor restored it; and Theodoret speaks of it as existing in his own day (Theodoret, H. E. 1, 11).

The duties of the widows who had thus a separate place upon the church roll were of two kinds. For some of them the model was the Anna of the Gospel "which departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day" (St. Luke ii. 37, referred to specially in Const. Apost. 3, 1: cf. S. Basil, Epist. 174 (283), p. 261): others were employed in the good works of nursing the sick, urging the younger women to live chastely, and, without teaching the mysteries of the kingdom of God, making converts of heathen women. The leading early rule is Διατ. Κλήμ. c. 18, referred to above, "Let three widows be appointed: of whom let two continue in prayer for all who are in trouble . . . and let one attend to those who are being tried by illnesses, ministering to them, and vigilant, and reporting their necessities to the presbyters." This rule is repeated in the Jacobite canons of Gregory Barhebraeus, cap. 7, sect 7, ap. Mai Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. vol. x. pars ii. p. 50, and in the Coptic Apostolical Constitutions, ed. Tattam, p. 24. A more precise account of the duties of a widow, especially in regard to "those who are without," is given in Const. Apost. 3, 5: cf. Clem. Alex. Strom. 3, p. 536, who traces back this part of the ministry of women to the times of the apostles. Origen (in Isaiam, Hom. 6, vol. iii. p. 117, ed. Delarue) speaks of their duty in relation to younger women; Tertullian (de Veland. Virg. c. 9) implies the existence of a similar duty, in giving as the reason for the restriction as to age and having borne children, "ut facile norint ceteras et consilio et solatio juvare." The leading Western canon in Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 103, "viduae quae stipendiis ecclesiae sustentantur tam assidue in dei opere esse debent ut et meritis et orationibus suis ecclesiam adjuvent." (It is interesting to find an allusion to the work of widows in the satirical account of the Christians which is given by Lucian, de Morte Pere-

How long this primitive institution continued is not clear; the obligation of the church to help its widows of course continued, and a long catena of passages might be made to shew how constantly the obligation was recognised and inculcated; but there are no certain traces of the recognition of the primitive class of poor widows after the later books of the Apostolical Constitutions in the East and the Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua in the West. In the meantime another "ordo viduarum" was being formed, which was not limited to those who were more than sixty years of age or who were in need of support. This second order of widows, which long survived the first, and which (though distinguished from it so early as the time of Chrysostom, Hom. de Viduis, Op. tom. iii. p. 323, ed. Migne) has often been confounded with it, arose out of the strong feeling against second marriages which manifested itself in the course of the second century. It came to be considered meritorious for a woman who had lost her husband, not merely to abstain from a second marriage, but to take a vow of abstinence, and to indicate her vow by adopting a peculiar dress ("vestis fuscior," S. Hieron. Epist. 38 ad Marcell. vol. i. p. 174). This ascetic tendency was especially strong in the West, and the great Latin fathers of the end of the fourth century did their best to encourage it. St. Ambrose wrote a treatise De Viduis (op. vol. ii. p. 184), and elsewhere speaks of the "grace of widowhood" as a plant of specially Christian growth (in Evang. sec. Luc. lib. 3, 18, p. 1320; Hexaem. 5, 19, p. 105). St. Jerome's circle of noble ladies at Rome contained several who had taken upon themselves the vows of widowhood, and his letters contain many commendations of those who had done so (e.g. Epist. 38 ad Marcell. p. 174; Epist. 108 ad Eustoch. p. 690; Epist. 123 ad Ageruch. p. 900); to one who was wavering in her purpose, he ends a long letter by saying, "Reflect daily that you will one day die, and you will never think of a second marriage" (Epist. 54 ad Furium, p. 282). St. Augustine also wrote a treatise De Bono Viduitatis (Migne, P. L. vol. xli.); in it he does not agree with the Novatians and Tertullian that second marriages are always to be condemned (c. 4), nor even with those who thought that the second marriage of a widow who had taken a vow of continence was adultery (c. 10), but he strongly urges that widows should take such a vow, and that having taken it they should persevere (c. 19).

The result of this inculcation of the virtue of widowhood was that a large number of widows took the vow. But some of those who did so appear to have been influenced only by a desire to gain greater freedom and to have a decent cloke for lasciviousness. The civil law, which had at first supported the ecclesiastical tendency, was compelled to check it. Majorian enacted, after reciting the abuse of the vow of widowhood, that childless widows under forty years of age must either marry again or forfeit half their property to the public chest (Novell. Majorian, tit. 6, 1, 1, ed. Haenel, p. 306). The church, on the other hand, continued to proclaim the merit of perpetual widowhood. It made all persons who married a widow ineligible for admission to holy orders, or, if already in orders, ineligible for promotion [ORDERS, HOLY; Qualifications for, pp. 1485, 1492]; and if the widow of a clerk married again, she was liable to perpetual seclusion in a convent. A curious instance of the latter rule is afforded by Gregory the Great: the widow of a subdeacon who, after her husband's death, had married again, had been visited with this ordinary punishment of seclusion; but it was discovered that her husband, before his death, had resigned his office; whereupon Gregory orders the widow to be released (S. Greg. M. Epist. 4, 36, ad Leonem, p. 716). It is probable that among the Teutonic peoples the ecclesiastical tendency was fostered by the feeling against second marriages which is mentioned by Tacitus (Germ. c. 19), and which is expressed both in the Teutonic codes and in the Merovingian capitularies (cf. Walter, Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte, 2^o Ausg. § 487).

It is clear that for several centuries widows who took the vow were free to live, as they had lived before, in their own houses. But by the eighth century a feeling had grown up, especially in Gaul and Spain, that the only safety from temptation lay in their living, as virgins under a vow usually lived, in monasteries. In A.D. 748 Pippin and the Gallican clergy put the formal question to pope Zachary "whether widows who lived in their own houses could save their souls," to which the pope gives no definite answer, but, following the decretal of Gelasius, leaves those who break their vows to the judgment of God (Zachar. Pap. Epist. ad Pippin. ap. Cenni Codex Carolinus, vol. i. p. 46, and Migne, P. L. vol. xcvi. 84). In the following century the Gallican church abolished the option which, though discouraged, had still continued to exist, and enacted that professed widows should no longer be allowed to live in private houses (6 Conc. Paris, A.D. 829, lib. i. c. 44). In this, as in some other respects, pope Nicholas I. disapproved of the Gallican enactment, and refused to allow widows to be forced into monasteries (Nicol. I. Respons. ad Bulgar. c. 87, ap. Mansi, vol. xv. p. 429). But ultimately the Gallican rule prevailed; the taking of the vows of widowhood implied entrance into a monastery; the order of widows was merged in that of nuns, and, as may be gathered from the omission of the rites of benediction of widows in the later Sacramentaries, at length disappeared altogether.

The taking of the vow of perpetual widowhood was accompanied by the adoption of a dress which at first probably differed from the ordinary dress only in its material and its colour (S. Hieron. Epist. 38 ad Marcell. vol. i. p. 174, S. August. Epist. cclxii. 9; ap. Migne, P. L. vol. xxxiii. 1081). The assumption of this dress was probably at first the private act of the widow herself, unattended by any ceremony; but it soon became usual to give greater emphasis to the vow of which it was the token by making it in the presence of a bishop. Even this was in the first instance a private and not a public ceremony; for the first council of Orange, A.D. 441, c. 27, speaks only of "viduitatis servandae professionem coram episcopo in secretario habitam imposita ab episcopo veste viduali indicandam."

But ultimately, in the West, the act was attended with a ceremonial for which provision is made in most early ordinals. This was especially the case after the identification or confusion of the order of widows with the order of deaconesses. In early times, and probably always in the East, the two orders had unquestionably been distinct. (1) Their functions were distinct, widows being employed in prayer and in tending the sick, whereas deaconesses had the special duties of assisting at the baptism of women, and of guarding the church doors. (S. Epiphanius, Expos. Fid. c. 21, p. 1104, Pseudo-Ignatius, ad Antioch. c. 12, Constit. Apost. 3. 15). (2) The mode of appointment was different, deaconesses having imposition of hands, which widows had not (Const. Apost. 8. 18, 29). (3) The Apostolical Constitutions state it as a mark of a good widow, that she subordinates herself to the deaconesses as well as to the presbyters and deacons (Const. Apost. 3. 7.). (4) A deaconess might be a virgin (Const. Apost. 4. 17, Sozomenus, H. E. 8. 23). But it is clear from the enactments of the council of Epaon, A.D. 517, c. 21, and the second council of Tours, c. 21, fifty years later, that in the Frankish and Burgundian kingdoms the distinction had come to be disregarded. It may also be noted that the Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua, c. 12, give to widows the same functions in the baptism of women which in the East were assigned to deaconesses. It was a natural result that many parts of the rite of ordination were common to widows and deaconesses. The earliest ritual is that of the Missale Francorum (Muratori, Liturgia Rom. Vet. vol. iii. p. 463), which consists of two parts, (1) the benediction of the widow's clothes, (2) the benediction of the widow herself. For the first part two prayers are given, which are found also in Egbert's Pontifical (ed. Surtees Society, p. 110); where two other prayers, "Deus qui vestimentum salutare," . . . "Deus bonarum virtutum dator," . . . are added, which are also found in the text of the Gregorian Sacramentary (as given by Muratori, vol. ii. p. 785), and in the Codex Maffieianus (ibid. vol. iii. p. 103), for the consecration of the vestments of either a widow or virgin. The second part consists of three prayers, (a) "Consolare Domine hanc famulam," . . . which is found also in Egbert's Pontifical, p. 110, in Hittorp's Ordo Romanus, p. 149, in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Muratori, vol. ii. p. 380), and in the Codex Maffieianus (ibid. vol. iii. p. 109); (b) "Domine Deus virtutum coelestium," . . . which is found also in Hittorp's Ordo Romanus; (c) Deus qui Annam filiam Samuelis," . . . which is partly found also in Egbert's Pontifical and in the Missale Gallicanum Vetus (Muratori, vol. iii. p. 507); and which in Hittorp's Ordo Romanus, p. 144, forms part of the office of the consecration of a deaconess. Egbert's Pontifical adds another prayer, which is omitted from the other ordinals at the consecration of a widow, but occurs in Hittorp's Ordo Romanus, ibid. in the consecration of a deaconess. The rites of imposing the veil and of placing under the bishop's ban all who disturb the peace of the widow or deaconess are identical in the two cases in Hittorp's Ordo, pp. 144, 149; in each case, it is the deaconess or widow herself who places the veil upon her head. This point is of some importance, as interpreting and illustrating the Western rule that no bishop should veil a widow; (Gelasius, Epist. 9 ad Episcopum Lucanum, c. 15, Decretum Generale, ap. Hinschius, Decretales Pseudo-Isidorianae, p. 652; repeated in Conc. Rotom. c. 9, Karoli M. Capit. Aquisgran. A.D. 789, c. 59. The rule seems sometimes to have been interpreted as prohibiting the veiling of widows at all; its meaning appears to have been that only bishops could veil virgins, and that only presbyters could veil widows; so 6 Conc. Paris. A.D. 829, lib. i. c. 40).

A widow who after thus making a solemn profession of continence broke her vow, was liable to severe ecclesiastical censure. Gelasius, Decretum Generale, c. 21, ut supra, had been content to leave such an one to the judgment of God. But the African, Spanish, and Gallican councils imposed the penalty of a more or less lengthened excommunication; Stat. Eccles. Antiqu. c. 104, 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 10, 3 Aurel. c. 18, 4 Tolet. c. 56, 5 Paris. c. 15, 6 Tolet. 6. The Eastern rule visited a deaconess who married with death and confiscation (Nomocanon, tit. 9, c. 29, ed. Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Graec. Mon. vol. ii. p. 564).

It is probable that at one time, in the East, the senior widows had as such a distinct rank and distinct functions. As women had their own deaconesses, so also they seem in some places to have had their own presbyteresses. The references to them are few in number. The most important is that of the apocryphal Acta et Martyrium Matthaei, c. 28 (according to the Paris MS. as edited by Tischendorf, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, p. 187), which speaks of the apostle as having ordained the wife of a certain king as πρεσβυτις, and his son's wife as deaconess. The Council of Laodicea, c. 11, implies their existence in its prohibition of their appointment for the future; but this prohibition must be held to refer to their functions, or to their place in church (προκαθημένας), and not to their existence as a class, since they are distinctly recognized in the Apostolical Constitutions as being co-ordinate with widows and virgins (2, 57), though inferior to deaconesses (2, 28), and also since Epiphanius (Expos. Fid. c. 4, p. 1060), arguing against the Collyridians, states that the church gave the title πρεσβυτιδας to the elder widows. The earlier Western collections of canons understand the Laodicean canon as referring to 'mulieres quae apud Graecos presbyterae appellantur, apud nos autem viduae seniores, conversae, et matriculariae' (Fulgentius Ferrandus, Breviat. Canon. 221, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. lxxvii. 960; so Isidorus Mercator, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. cxxx. 287); and a canonist of the 10th century, whose source of information seems to be lost, speaks of them as having the power 'praedicandi, jubendi, vel docendi' (Atto Vercellensis, Epist. 8, ap. D'Achery, Spicilegium, vol. i. p. 438). It is probable that they were also to some extent recognized in the West: for although in many places, e.g. in St. Gregory's Epist. 9, 7, p. 931, the term 'presbyterae' may be only used of the wife of a presbyter, on the other hand Mabillon's Ordo Romanus, ix. p. 91 and Hittorp's Ordo Romanus, p. 88, make a distinct provision for the benediction 'presbyterissimum atque diaconissarum.' Unfortunately, however, these references, though clear and sufficient to establish their existence, stand altogether alone.

It may be added, partly in explanation of the above quotation from Ferrandus, that in the East as well as in the West the term 'widow' was applied to a wife who lived in voluntary separation from her husband: the most pertinent instance is afforded by a sepulchral inscription in Le Bas and Waddington's Inscriptions Grecques et Latines d'Asie Mineure, No. 816, found at Côtiaëum in Phrygia, σωφροσύνην ζήσασα ἐν χηροσύνῃ κατέλειπε σύνευνον χαλεπῶ πένθει περιόμενον. [E. H.]

WIGS. Boldetti (Osservazioni, p. 297) relates that in a tomb of the cemetery of St. Cyriaca, which was without inscription, but which he supposes to be the tomb of a martyr, he found a wig with the hair arranged in plaits and still lying on the head of the corpse.

The use and abuse of false hair among the pagan nations of antiquity is well known. Juvenal and Martial direct all the force of their satire against the women who try to revive their youth by this means, "enclosing their heads in a sort of case," like a sword in its scabbard; against the men who change their hair-dye with the seasons of the year, and the dotards who think they can outwit Fate by a blonde wig. Lampridius gives an absurd sketch of the wig of the emperor Commodus, sprinkled with glutinous perfumes, and then powdered with gold dust.

Christians were not always free from the influence of the prevailing fashion; and it was to be expected that converts from Paganism would not at once abandon the fashions of their former life. Long and flowing locks have always been objects of admiration, at all events on women, and St. Paul expressly sanctions their use (1 Cor. xi. 15). Hence, perhaps, the desire among Christians to supply their place by artificial means. This brought down the censure of the fathers of the church, and Tertullian signalizes himself by an attack on women who "gave their hair no peace." He speaks in another passage (de Cultu Fœmin. 7) of "the monstrosities of twined and stitched hair," which were in vogue, and Jerome, in a letter to Marcella (xxiii.), pointedly alludes to the rage for wearing wigs among women "who with false hair make an edifice of their heads." In the frescoes and sculptures at the catacombs are to be seen representations of women in prayer, or seated at banquets, with abundant hair very artificially dressed. This marks their epoch, and is a great help in determining the date of these monuments. [E. C. H.]

WILLS (Testamenta). The rules of ecclesiastical law relating to testamentary matters cannot be collected in any systematic arrangement, as they are for the most part in the form of exceptions to the general law. The civil law upon the subject has been, to a large extent, incorporated into the canon law of the period subsequent to the limit of this article; and it is a matter of some difficulty to disentangle from this great mass of legislation those enactments which properly belong to the ecclesiastical law of the first eight centuries.

In this article the regulations to be found in the different codes will be arranged under the following heads:—

- I. The Capacity to bequeath by Will.
- II. The Capacity to take under a Will.
- III. The Property which may be made the Subject of a Will.
- IV. Miscellaneous Provisions.
- V. Succession by Intestacy.

The law relating to the testamentary disposition of Apostates will be found in the article on that subject. [APOSTASY, p. 104.] See also PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH (p. 1730 ff.), HOSPITALS (p. 788, col. 1). BISHOP (p. 238, col. 1), and IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES OF THE CLERGY (p. 826, col. 2).

1. The Capacity to bequeath by Will.

In France.—By the second canon of the second council of Lyons (A.D. 567), bishops and other clergy might bequeath property to the church without the formalities required by the civil law. This law was repeated in the tenth canon of the fifth council of Paris (A.D. 615). The eighth canon of this council contained the provision, that the archbishop or archdeacon should not appropriate to themselves or their church any property left by a clerk to another church.

In the African Church.—According to St. Augustine the right of giving or receiving by will was taken away from the Donatists. (Lib. 1, contr. Ep. Parmeniani, 12.)

Under the Imperial Law.—The duty of bequeathing property to the church was enforced in the amplest terms and facilitated by Constantine in A.D. 321 (Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 4). For the history of this constitution, see the note of Gothofred, and Thomassinus (3, 1, 16, and 18). This injunction was repeated in the Code of Justinian (1, 2, 1). As regards its extent, the better opinion amongst civilians would appear to be that it does not give the right of making a will, to those who had not otherwise that right. The solution of other questions arising upon this constitution will be found in the commentaries and summarized in the notes of Van Leeuwen (Antwerp, 1809).

Bequests thus made were secured to the possession of the church by a constitution of Leo (A.D. 470), inserted in the Code of Justinian (1, 2, 14).

Women were forbidden to bequeath property to ecclesiastical persons by a constitution of Valentinian A.D. 370 (Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 20).

This was extended so far as regards the property of deaconesses to bequests to the church and poor by Theodosius, A.D. 390 (Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 27). This last constitution was two months afterwards repealed as regards movables (Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 28). Both constitutions were abrogated by Marcian in A.D. 455 (Nov. Mart. 6). The observations of Baronius (Ann. ad ann. 455 sec. 25–28) on this Novell. may be compared with the notes of Gothofred on the three constitutions of Theodosius, in A.D. 381 (Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 7), a disability which was extended by the same emperor to Eunomians in A.D. 389 (Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 17). This right of giving and receiving by will was restored to and taken away from these heretics several times during the subsequent forty years. The seventh book of the history of Sozomen illustrates these changes of imperial policy and feeling.

At length in A.D. 428 a comprehensive constitution was promulgated by Theodosius the younger (Cod. Theod. 16, 5, 65), which confirmed the loss of testamentary rights in the case of twenty-three classes of heretics mentioned therein by name. These penalties were confirmed by Justinian in his code (1, 5). In the 129th Novell., A.D. 559, he grants privileges to the Samaritani, but these were taken away by Justin in the 144th Novell.

By a constitution of Valentinian in A.D. 426 (Cod. Theod. 16, 8, 28), two privileges were given to the converted children of Jews. In the first place they could not be disinherited or passed over by their Jewish parents, nor given less than they would receive under an intestacy. Secondly, even if they were disinherited for a crime against their parents, they were still to receive the quarta Falcidia. In the code of Justinian is inserted a constitution of Marcian (A.D. 455), enabling women dedicated to religion, in the technical sense, to bequeath their property to ecclesiastical purposes (Cod. 1, 2, 13). Justinian himself in A.D. 538 forbade to monks the right of making a will (Nov. 76, 1). In the 123rd Novell. (A.D. 546) he secured to presbyters and clerks of inferior orders the right of bequeathing their property (Nov. 123, 19).

Under the Barbarian Codes.—By the laws of Luitprand, king of the Lombards in A.D. 721, minors under eighteen years of age could bequeath a part of their property in favour of churches and hospitals (Davoud Oughlou, vol. ii. p. 61).

II. The Capacity to take under a Will.

In France.—By the 6th canon of the council of Agde (A.D. 506) followed by the 20th canon of the council of Rheims (A.D. 625) property bequeathed to a clerk was considered to be bequeathed to his church.

In the African Church.—It had, in St. Augustine's time, become a rule that the church should receive no estates given to the great detriment and prejudice of common rights, as if a father disinherited his children to make the church his heir (Augustine, Serm. 49, De Diversis: Possidius, Vita Augustini, c. 24; cited by Bingham, 5, 4, 13).

By the 13th canon of the third council of Carthage (A.D. 397) bishops and clergy were forbidden to bequeath their property to non-Catholic Christians, even when blood relations. By the 81st canon in the Codex Ecclesiae Africanae (A.D. 419), bishops who appointed heretical or pagan heirs were pronounced anathema, and removed from the roll of those whose names were recited as priests of God. The same penalty was inflicted if by his dying intestate the property of a bishop should devolve on heretics or pagans.

Under the Imperial Law.—Justinian permitted the disinheritance of heretical children by their parents in the 115th Novell. A.D. 542, and of heretical parents by their children (3, 14; 4, 8). In A.D. 546 he forbade the disinheritance of children by parents and of parents by children by reason of their embracing a monastic life (Nov. 123, 41). He also directed that if a person had entered a monastic life, and had died before dividing his property, his children only took a pars legitima, the rest of the property going to the monastery (Nov. 123, 38). Parents were not allowed altogether to disinherit children taking orders or entering a monastery, as appears from a Constitution of Justinian, A.D. 534 (Cod. 1, 3, 55).

III. The Property which may be made the Subject of a Will.

In the East.—The council of Antioch held in A.D. 341, in its twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth canons, provides for the separation of the private property of a bishop from the property of the church under his care, so that the latter might not be bequeathed by him with his private property. [On these canons, and the apostolic canons on the same subject, see ALIENATION, p. 51, col. 1.]

A case in which this law was disregarded will be found in the acts of the council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451). Four presbyters of the church of Edessa accused their metropolitan, Ibas, of conniving at the misconduct of his suffragan, Daniel, who had bequeathed ecclesiastical property away from the church.

In France, by the thirty-third canon of the council of Agde (A.D. 506), if a bishop, not having children or grandchildren, did not make the church his heir, his property was to be mulcted of a sum equivalent to that spent by him out of ecclesiastical revenues on other objects; but if he left descendants, they must indemnify the church out of the inheritance. The canons numbered forty-eight and fifty-one (but which are of doubtful authenticity) forbid bishops to leave to heirs or legatees any church property. This provision as to legacies is found in the seventeenth canon of the council of Epaon (A.D. 517), but it excepts cases where the testator has given an equivalent out of his private property.

In Spain, the first canon of the first council of Seville (A.D. 590) repeated the above-cited thirty-third canon of the council of Agde.

Under the Barbarian Codes.—The laws of Aistulphus (A.D. 749) gave exceptional validity to wills in favour of holy places. In the laws of the Visigoths provisions will be found for restraining the cupidity of the heirs of bishops and other clergy (Davoud Oughlou, vol. ii. p. 151, vol. i. p. 163).

Upon the whole matter Van Espen (Jus Ecclesiasticum, 2, 4, 1, 8) draws the conclusion that in the ancient canons it was forbidden to the clergy as well as to the bishops to bequeath any property which they had acquired from the church.

As to the operation of the Lex Falcidia upon bequests for church purposes, see PROPERTY (p. 1731), and Ferraris, Bibliotheca sub voce Legatum, secs. 137–138.

IV. Miscellaneous Provisions.

In France.—By the fourth canon of the first council of Vaison (A.D. 442), any person as an infidel who should keep back the gifts of the faithful departed, was to be cast out of the church. This canon was repeated in the twenty-second canon of the third council of Orleans (A.D. 538). The fourth council of Orleans (A.D. 541) simply provides in canon fourteen that property left by a lawful will to the church or to a bishop cannot be demanded by the heirs of the deceased. The more stern provisions of the earlier councils were repeated by the fourth canon of the first council of Mâcon (A.D. 581).

In the African Church it was forbidden by the eighteenth canon of the Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua that a bishop should accept a guardianship under a will.

In Spain.—By the seventh canon of the ninth council of Toledo (A.D. 655) the relations of a deceased bishop were forbidden to deal with his property without the consent of the metropolitan, and in the case of the clergy without the consent of the bishop.

In England the only distinct enactment not brought in by the adoption of foreign councils would seem to be the second answer in the dialogue of archbishop Egbert of York (A.D. 732-766; see Haddan and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 403), where he directs the clergy not to become witnesses of nuncupatory wills except in company with other persons.

Under the Imperial Law.—That the clergy should presume to decide upon testamentary questions seemed to Justin a most improper act—"absurdum etenim clericis est, immo etiam opprobriosum, si peritos se voluit ostendere disceptationum esse forensium," and he forbade it (A.D. 524) under a heavy fine. (Cod. 1, 3, 41).

Justinian in A.D. 528 gave 100 years the limit of actions upon legacies to ecclesiastical purposes (Cod. 1, 2, 24); but he afterwards reduced it to forty years, except in the case of the church of Rome (Nov. 131, 6).

Justinian in A.D. 530 promulgated a long constitution (Cod. 1, 3, 46), imposing upon the bishops, and in their default upon the metropolitans, the duty of looking after the proper application of bequests to pious uses.

Two years later he exempted bequests by the clergy of their "peculium quasi castrense" from any "querela inofficiosi" (Cod. 1, 3, 50); but this privilege was taken away A.D. 546 (Nov. 123, 19).

There are provisions in a constitution of Justinian of A.D. 530 for determining the construction of wills when the object of the testator's bounty is obscurely indicated—e.g. bequests to Our Lord are to be held to be given to the church of the town or neighbourhood of the deceased, bequests to archangels and martyrs to churches dedicated by their name in the town or neighbourhood, failing such to the church so named in the metropolis. If there are more churches than one of the same name the intention of the testator must if possible be ascertained; if this cannot be done, then the poorest church is to be chosen (Cod. 1, 2, 26). [For the further legislation on this subject in the 131st Novell. see PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH.]

V. Succession by Intestacy.

In the earliest times the heirs of the clergy, whether bishops, presbyters, or others of inferior order succeeded in case of intestacy, as appears from a constitution of Valentinian, A.D. 334 (Cod. 1, 3, 20), in which no distinction appears. Care was, however, taken that the private property of bishops should be separated from the church property, which they administered in right of their sees, so that the former alone should pass to the private heirs. (See Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, cap. 24; Conc. Chalc. A.D. 451, cap. 22.)

In the 6th century the canons of councils, which directed bishops to make the church their heir in default of issue, affected to the same extent the succession by intestacy (see Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, cap. 33). But this restriction did not apply to the property of the clergy below the order of bishops; and in consequence attempts were wont to be made to exclude the heirs of the clergy. The seventh canon of the fifth council of Paris (A.D. 615) was directed against this abuse.

The contrary practice, by which the heirs of an intestate bishop appropriated church property, had to be guarded against. This temptation seems to have been especially felt in Spain, and canons of several councils are concerned with its suppression. (Conc. Tarracon. A.D. 516, cap. 12; Conc. Ilrerdense, A.D. 523, cap. ult.) By degrees the moveable property of intestate ecclesiastics was claimed by the church on the pretext that this property had been acquired from church property. This claim was styled the jus spoli.

The order of succession to the property of intestate clergy did not differ from that of laymen, except as regards the children of those clergy who were forbidden to marry. These children could not by a constitution of Justinian in A.D. 530 (Cod. 1, 3, 45), even succeed to their mother's property. If a clerk died intestate and left no heirs, his property went to the church which he had served. (Cod. 1, 3, 20, A.D. 334; Nov. 131, cap. 13, A.D. 545; Capit. Carol. lib. 5, cap. 173.)

Passing to the rules which govern the succession by clerks to the property of intestates, they succeeded in the same manner as laymen (Cod. 1, 3, 56, 1) and their professional earnings were not brought into computation (Cod. 1, 3, 34). The same law applied both to seculars and regulars (Cod. 1, 3, 56), but this was afterwards altered, and the community succeeded to the rights of regulars. (Nov. 5 and 123, cap. 38.)

See upon the succession in intestacy Boehmer, Jus Ecclesiast. Protest. lib. 3, tit. 27.

WOMEN. Certain features in the domestic and social influence of women among Christian communities will be found treated of in the article on SOCIAL LIFE. It is proposed here to notice some of the special points of difference in the Christian, as compared with the pagan, conception of woman's character and duties.

The estimate of womanhood in the earliest Christian literature exhibits a remarkable contrast to that of paganism, as both attaching far more importance to female modesty and chastity, and, at the same time, greatly enhancing the dignity of the female character and enlarging the sphere of woman's activities. The Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians speaks of the husbands whom he addresses, as exhorting their wives to the discharge of their duties with a blameless, grave, and pure conscientiousness, and in a spirit of conjugal affection, and also teaching them to superintend domestic matters with dignified decorum (σεμνῶς) [c. i. ed. Dressel, p. 48]. In the same manner, Polycarp (ad Philipp. c. 4) exhorts the Christian wives of Philippi to live in the faith, in love and purity, to duly honour their husbands, and to instruct their children in the fear of the Lord. Second marriages being systematically discouraged in the early church, the advice given by the same writer to the widows seems directed against the faults to which women, when lonely and unemployed, are specially prone—"calumny, speaking against their neighbours, bearing false witness, and avarice" (ed. Dressel, p. 381).

The advice of Tertullian (ad Uxorem, bk. ii. c. 8) that a woman should not refuse to marry one slightly below herself in station, provided he is likely to prove in other respects a good husband, points probably to the existence of a certain social ambition among those to whom his treatise is addressed, which he considered unworthy of the Christian character. As contrasted with the cruelty which too often disgraced the privacy of pagan households, we find Chrysostom observing that it is a shame for a man to beat his female slave, much more his wife (in Epist. i. ad Corinth. Hom. 26; Migne, Patrol. Graec. lxi. 222).

The teaching of the most enlightened of the fathers was undoubtedly to the effect that there was no natural inferiority in the woman to the man. Theodoret (Graec. Affect. Curat. bk. v.) insists emphatically on their exact equality, and says that God made woman from man in order that the tendencies and action of both might be harmonious. Sometimes, indeed, he observes, woman has been found superior to man in encountering adversity (Migne, lxxxiii. 836). Chrysostom (Hom. lxi. 3) says that no one is more fit to instruct and exhort her husband than a pious woman. This conception differed, however, materially from that of Plato (Repub. v. p. 455), in that while the Greek philosopher sought to obliterate the ordinary distinctions between the sexes, the Christian father held that nature assigned to woman her special and distinct province of activity. Chrysostom, in a passage of singular beauty, gives us a comparison between the duties of the wife and those of the husband, the former being represented as in some respects the more dignified; for while the husband is described as engaged in the rougher work of life, in the market or the law-courts, the wife is represented as remaining at home and devoting much of her time to prayer, to reading the Scriptures, καὶ τῇ ἄλλῃ φιλοσοφίᾳ. When her husband returns, harassed with his labours, it is her function to cheer and to soothe him, περικόπτειν αὐτοῦ τὰ περιττὰ καὶ ἄγρια τῶν λογισμῶν, so that he again goes forth into the world purified from the evil influences to which he has there been exposed, and carrying with him the higher influences of his home-life (in Joann. Hom. lxi.; Migne, lix. 340).

The participation of young females in the exercises of the palaestra and in races, commended by pagan theorists (Grote's Plato, iii. 217), is condemned by Clemens of Alexandria (Paed. iii. 10) as altogether repugnant to the notions of female modesty (Migne, viii. 626). Chrysostom (in Matt. Hom. i.) contrasts the difference in relation to these points between Christian and pagan teaching, and even goes so far as to affirm that true virginity was a notion which paganism was unable to realise (Migne, lvii. 19).

At the same time we have satisfactory evidence that this exalted conception of the female character and female duties did not involve any renunciation of her humbler functions. Clemens says that it is right that women should employ themselves in spinning, weaving, and watching the bread-maker (τῇ πεπτοῦσῃ), and that it is no disgrace for a wife to grind corn or to superintend the cookery with the view of pleasing her husband (Migne, viii. 626).

The excessive luxury of the 4th century would seem however to have been not less fatal to the maintenance of this high ideal than to other features of the Christian character. Amédée Thierry says that, by one of those contradictions which "déroutent la logique des idées," Christianity itself, essentially the religion of the poor, conspired to give to the manners of the Western empire a degree of effeminacy unknown in pagan times (Saint Jérôme, p. 2). Chrysostom declares that many of the ladies of Constantinople would not walk across even a single street to attend church, but required to be conveyed for the shortest distance (in Matt. Hom. vii.; Migne, lvii. 79). When there they were to be seen with their necks, heads, arms, and fingers loaded with golden chains and rings, their persons breathing precious odours, and their dresses of gold stuff and silk (Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. iv. c. 1). Others, again, affected masculine apparel, and seemed to blush for their womanhood, cutting short their hair, and presenting faces like those of eunuchs—"impudenter erigunt facies eunuchinas" (Jerome, Epist. 18). According to the same authority, the greater facilities possessed by ecclesiastics for gaining admission to female society was an inducement with some to become priests—"ut mulieres licentius vident" (ib.). Elsewhere Jerome strongly dissuades the clergy from accustoming themselves to private interviews with those of the other sex,—"Solus cum sola, secreto, et absque arbitro vel teste, non sedeas" (Epist. 52; Migne, xxii. 260).

The exaggerated importance attached by Jerome to the unwedded life, as one of superior sanctity, seems to have led him to dwell somewhat harshly on the weaknesses and worldliness of many of the wealthy matrons of his day. He represents them as given to excessive personal adornment, and bestowing much of their time on preparations for feasts and other household matters. When, however, we find him enumerating such obvious duties as "dispensatio domus, necessitates mariti, liberorum educatio, correctio servulorum," as prejudicial to the higher interests of the soul, we perceive that his tone is that of one to whom the ascetic life alone appeared adequately Christian (de Perp. Virg. c. 20; Migne, xxiii. 228). On the other hand, it is evident that the state of Roman society at this time rendered it exceptionally difficult for Christian women to carry the principles of their religion into daily practice. Of this Marcella's retirement to her mansion in the suburbs, as described by the same father, is an indication. He depicts the very different future which her mother Albina had designed for her—a splendid marriage and the possession of great wealth, while the daughter rarely issued from her seclusion save to visit the churches of the apostles and martyrs, especially those least frequented by the multitude (Epist. 96). The mistresses of large establishments, according to Jerome, were often exposed to exceptional temptations; and he states that young widows would sometimes consent to marry even pagan husbands in order to avoid being plundered by dishonest stewards and to escape the anxieties inseparable from the management of a large household, thus bringing home to their children by a former marriage "not a guardian, but an enemy; not a parent, but a tyrant" (Epist. 54; Migne, xxii. 291).

Among other indications of the confusion and demoralisation characteristic of the 5th century must be included that laxity of church discipline which permitted the performance of public religious rites to be sometimes entrusted to women. In the twenty-first canon of the collection ascribed to Gelasius this is spoken of as evidence of the "contempt" into which religion had fallen—"audivimus . . . ut feminae sacris altaribus ministrare firmentur, et cuncta quae non nisi virorum famulatu deputata sunt, sexum cui non competunt exhibere" (Migne, lvi. 420).

It is generally assumed, though on somewhat scanty and doubtful evidence, that at the period of the conversion of the Teutonic nations the regard for female chastity and the respect paid to the sex were greater among pagan communities than among the Latin races. But however this may have been, it is certain that the views inherited and handed down by the Western church with regard to "the personal and propriety liberty of women" were greatly superior to those that find expression in any of the barbaric codes. Something of this feeling seems reflected in Jerome when (Epist. 130) he censures parents for their too common practice of leaving deformed or otherwise unmarriageable daughters inadequately provided for (Migne, xxii. 981). "The church," says Sir Henry Maine, "conferred a great benefit on several generations by keeping alive the traditions of the Roman legislation respecting settled property;" and he points out that Christianity was really carrying on the tradition of the Roman dos. The formula of the marriage-service, "With all my worldly goods I thee endow," is one, he says, "which sometimes puzzles the English lawyer from its want of correspondence with anything which he finds among the oldest rules of English law" (Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 337; see also De Broglie, l'Eglise et l'Empire, I. ii. 273, and Eclaircissement D). [J. B. M.]

WONDERS (miracula, signa, prodigia, portentosa—θαύματα, θαυμάσια, σημεῖα, δυνάμεις, τέρατα, παράδοξα). The reported miracles which fall within the limits of our period constitute no compact homogeneous whole. They form themselves into distinct groups. One group, having for its object the conversion of the heathen, gathers round notable wonder-workers in pagan countries, such as Gregory of Neocaesarea (Thaumaturgus) and Martin of Tours. Another group, or other groups, of miracles, whose object is the support of Athanasian orthodoxy, gather round the great monks of the East—Antony, Hilarion, Pachomius—Ambrose in the West, and saints of lesser note and of later times in Spain, or appear as interpositions of Providence in the form of marvellous deliverances under cruelties inflicted by Vandal tyrants in Africa or Lombard invaders in Italy. Other miracles vindicate the sanctity of images or condemn the conduct of the Iconoclast. Others again, whose object is to glorify the enterprise and attest the piety of founders of monasteries, cluster thickly round a Benedict or Columban, amidst a galaxy of lesser wonders that stretch across the centuries in the acts of the saints. This classification, as bringing out the ethical features of the miracles and their relation to important events in church history, may well be borne in mind and allowed, so to speak, to run pari passu with a more methodical arrangement, according to which we shall classify the miracles thus:—

- I. Wonders wrought by Living Saints.
- II. By Relics.
- III. By the Eucharist.
- IV. By Pictures and Images.
- V. By Celestial Visitants.
- VI. Apart from human or angelic Agency, or the above-named Means.

In adopting for the purpose of further classification the division of miracles into those of beneficence and power, we do not regard these two heads as denoting distinct kinds of miracles, but simply classes, in the first of which the beneficence of the object and in the second the power of the performer is the dominant idea. Miracles of beneficence are also those of power—δυνάμεις—although miracles classed as those of power are not miracles of beneficence. Again, miracles of either class, but especially those of power, will appear as signs—σημεῖα—or pledges of a superhuman mission on the part of the performer, i.e. when they are wrought by a living saint, or, as Tertullian calls them, "documenta virtutum," attaining as such to the highest, because the ethical, character of a miracle, although both classes of miracles may degenerate into mere wonders—θαύματα, τέρατα—calling forth simply wonderment and amazement (see Trench, Notes on Mir. Intro.).

I. Wonders wrought by living Saints.—Whether by direct means, such as invocation of the name of Christ, prayer, signing of the cross, imposition of hands; or indirect, such as sending to the sick saints' garments or other garments, bread, oil, or water which had been blessed by saints.

One of the first points that strike us in the earlier notices of miracles which have reached us from the fathers is the absence of all claims on the part of the writers to the performance of the miracles they attest, and of all mention by name of those who wrought them. Thus Clemens Romanus states that there was a plentiful outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon all, and Ignatius, in his letter addressed to the church of Smyrna, says that church was mercifully blessed with every good gift; and they refer without doubt to miracles that were going on in the church, but they do not arrogate to themselves individually the power of overcoming the laws of nature, or specify any by name who possessed such a power, in which latter respect they stand in strong contrast with the chroniclers of the acts of later saints. As to the gifts here spoken of, they appeared in the form of the following powers: the casting out of devils, healing of diseases, raising the dead, speaking with tongues, the prevision of events, and seeing visions, the three first kinds being miracles of beneficence, the three last of power; the first finding their parallel in point of character and the sphere of human life they affect in the evangelical miracles; the last their source in the promises of our Lord and the predictions of Holy Writ.

1. Miracles of beneficence. (1) Exorcism and healing; (2) Raising the dead; (3) Deliverance, protection, succour.

(1) Justin Martyr says that Christians in the name of Jesus cast out demons from those whom pagan enchanters could not cure (Apol. ii. 6). Amongst the deeds of mercy which the true disciples of Christ performed in His name, Irenaeus specifies exorcisms and cures of the sick (Contra Hæres. ii. 32). Cyprian writes, "Osi audire eos velles quando a nobis adjurantur et torquentur" (Ad Demetr. xv.). Tertullian, "Place some possessed person before your tribunals; any Christian shall command that spirit to speak, who shall as surely confess himself to be a devil as elsewhere he will call himself a god falsely" (Apol. 23). And again, "Devils we not only despise, but both overcome and daily expose and expel from men, as is known to very many" (Ad Scorp. 2; cf. also Apol. 37). [DEMONIACS; EXORCISM.]

When we pass from this general testimony of the early fathers respecting the existence of a miraculous agency at work in their days to the more detailed accounts of later miracles, we learn more as to the means by which the miracles were wrought. We gather that on the whole these means were much the same as those which the apostles themselves and the saints of their time made use of, who on their part were guided in some measure by the example of our Lord, viz. in respect of prayer and the imposition of hands (Mark vi. 41, vii. 34; John xi. 41; Mark vi. 5), and in some measure by the practices He enjoined, viz. the anointing the sick with oil, and the use of His name (Mark vi. 13, xvi. 17; Luke x. 17), although, as we may see from Acts v. 15, 16, xix. 12, they did not restrict their methods of working cures either to the divine precedents or precepts.

Taking first the miracles of exorcism and healing which were wrought by direct means, viz. invocation of the name of Christ, prayer, signing of the cross, and imposition of hands, we find that some of the earliest of which we possess any detailed account are those which Gregory, bishop of Neocaesarea in Pontus, wrought in the 3rd century, but the record of which belongs to the 4th century and is due to Gregory of Nyssa, who is said to have received his information from his grandmother Macrina.

As being less notable than the miracles of other kinds which the saint wrought, we shall only refer to his exorcism of an evil spirit from a youth by imposition of hands (Newman, on Miracles, p. xxviii.), and to his miraculous healing of the plague-stricken in Neocaesarea (Fleury, liv. vii. c. 11). Of the miracles of this class which the earlier Eastern monks wrought, those of Antony and Hilarion may stand as examples. St. Athanasius, who wrote the life of the first-named monk and was his personal friend, says that "everywhere he had had an anxious desire for truth" in the accounts he had given. Of Antony's exorcisms we may name the instance of a boy whom he cured in a fishing-boat, and of whose state of possession indications were given by the presence of a foul stench in the boat (Newman, on Mir. xxxi.), and of a girl from whom he cast out an evil spirit at Alexandria, whither he had gone in his old age to support the party of Athanasius (Fleury, xi. 41); and of his cures that which he wrought in the desert upon a man afflicted either with epilepsy or madness, not by any means he employed on the spot, but by bidding him to go to Egypt, and assuring him that he would there be healed (Newman, on Mir. xxxi.). Respecting the miracles Hilarion wrought in Sicily, which island was together with Palestine the chief scene of his wonders, we have the testimony of a Jew, in Greece, who reported that "a prophet of the Christians had appeared in Sicily and was doing so many miracles and signs that men thought him one of the old saints." Jerome, who wrote his life, records the following miracles: restoration of sight to a woman who for ten years had been blind; a cure of paralysis; another of dropsy; exorcising the possessed—even a camel who in its fury had caused the death of many (Newman, on Mir. p. xxxii.; Jerome, t. ii.). Of his exorcisms we may specify one as remarkable for its being followed by the offer of a sum of money on the part of the man who had been dispossessed, and for the saint's reply that his acceptance of it would surely bring back the possession; and another as notable for the capacity which the energumen displayed, on the occasion of his cure, of speaking in Syriac and Greek, of which languages he, being a Frank by birth and uneducated, had no knowledge (Fleury, xii. 17).

Turning to the West, we find in the 4th century St. Ambrose curing a woman of palsy, laying his hands on her in prayer, while she touched his garment (Paulini Vit. S. Ambros. in Append. 2, § 10), casting out evil spirits, and on the other hand causing for his misdeeds a thief to be repossessed (Vita, 43; Fleury, xx. 20), and St. Martin of Tours delivering a slave of a devil, and healing a leper at Paris (Sulp. Sev. Vita, 16, 19); and in the following century Germanus of Auxerre, at Arles, curing a prefect's wife of a quartan ague; at Alesia, bestowing power of speech upon a girl who had lost it for twenty years; at Autun, healing a girl of a withered hand; in England, a boy of contracted limbs; at Milan and Ravenna, casting out evil spirits (Acta SS. ad d. 31 Jul.; La Vie du grand St. Germain, par Dom Viole, A.D. 1654).

As examples of exorcisms and cures wrought by indirect means—viz. the sending to the sick the garments of saints, or other garments which saints had blessed, or bread, oil or water, which likewise had been blessed—we may mention the following instances. Of the exorcisms two are noteworthy as indicative of the obstacles which the energumen, in the one case by persistence in wrong-doing, in the other by craftiness and obstinacy, could oppose to the salutary exercise of thaumaturgic gifts. The monk Pachomius had been applied to by a man whose daughter had an evil spirit to work a cure. The saint bade the man bring him one of his daughter's tunics, warning him at the same time that the blessing he should bestow upon it would be of no avail as long as his daughter continued to live a sinful life. Accordingly the girl was not cured till she had confessed and forsaken her sin. In the other instance, the saint had directed that in order to obtain a cure the energumen should before each meal take a small piece of a loaf of bread which had been blessed. As, however, he refused to touch the bread, the device was adopted of concealing morsels of it inside dates, but with no better success. The demoniac carefully extracted them. At last, having been left some days without food, he took the bread and was cured (Acta SS. ad d. 14 Maii; Fleury, xv. 69). By means of consecrated oil Hilarion healed the bites of serpents (Newman, on Mir. p. xxxii.; Jerome, t. ii.), and St. Martin of Tours cured a paralytic girl, when at the point of death, by putting into her mouth a few drops of the like oil (Sulp. Sev. Vita, 17). Threads frayed from St. Martin's garments healed the diseased when wound round the neck or fingers, and a letter written by the saint cured a girl of fever, when laid upon her chest (Vita, 19, 20). Straw upon which Germanus of Auxerre had reposed for a single night cured a demoniac when bound down upon it; and a barley loaf which the bishop had blessed and sent to the empress Placidia possessed, and for a long while retained, wonder-working properties (Acta SS. ad d. 31 Jul.; Ve de grand St. Germain, par l'abbé Vide). Lastly, by threads of her garments St. Geneviève of Paris cast out devils, and by bits of her candle cured the sick (Acta SS. ad d. 3 Jan.).

A miraculous cure, occurring in the 4th century, deserves notice, as having been wrought by the performer of it upon her own person, and by the employment—as doubtless was often the case—of more than one of the recognised means of healing, as well as for its indications of the asceticism of the age. Macrina, sister of St. Basil of Caesarea and St. Gregory of Nyssa, had for years suffered from a tumour in her breast, for the cure of which she had, from motives of modesty and in opposition to the earnest entreaties of her mother, persistently refused to avail herself of medical aid. One morning, having passed the night in supplication, she gathered from the floor a little dust upon which her tears had fallen and applied it to her sore, begging at the same time her mother to make the sign of the cross over the diseased part. The result was an instantaneous cure:—a slight scar, however, remaining, which years afterwards, when St. Macrina lay in death, was pointed out to her brother Gregory in proof of the miracle then for the first time divulged (Acta SS. ad d. 19 Jul.).

In illustration of the ethical aspect in which miracles of beneficence might be viewed by those who were the subjects or witnesses of them, we may note the cure of long-standing paralysis which Euthymius, a monk who lived in Palestine in the 5th century, wrought upon Terebo, the son of a Saracenic chief, and which resulted in the conversion to Christianity not only of the patient himself, but his father and attendants (Fleury, xxiv. 27).

With regard to the comparative prevalence of miraculous gifts of healing, as exercised by living saints, in the different ages of our period, we can form an opinion only from the records which have reached us. Judging from these the power of working cures was in no wise diminished in the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries. Demoniacal possessions, madness, leprosy, paralysis, blindness, deafness, loss of speech, lameness—not to name other diseases and infirmities—were ills which, occurring no less frequently than in preceding ages, constantly called forth, and found relief through, the thaumaturgic powers with which monks and bishops were endowed, while accidents such as those to which monks themselves were exposed in the performance of their agricultural labours—the loss of a finger or thumb in reaping, or wounds on the forehead from the impact of a wedge in felling trees or cleaving logs—were naturally not excluded from the sphere of miraculous treatment (Vita S. Columb. in Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.). As a specimen of the powers with which monks were gifted for the casting out of evil spirits and working cures we have only to follow St. Columban in his journey from the east to the west of France when driven by Theodoric from his dominions (ibid.). Nor was there any partiality in the distribution of these miraculous powers over the various regions of Christendom, although the accident of the place of birth or dwelling of those who undertook to record certain miracles might lead us to an opposite opinion. If, for example, during the 6th century, thaumaturgy, as exercised in the matter of exorcism and healing, shone brightly in Italy in the persons of monks and bishops—as to judge from the writings of pope Gregory (Dial. i. 4; ii. 26, 30; iii. 6, 21; i. 10, et passim) it did—it shone no less brightly in Palestine in the person of the abbat Theodosius (Acta SS. ad d. 11 Jan.) or in France in the instances of Melanius, bishop of Rennes (Acta SS. ad d. 6 Jan.) and St. Geneviève of Paris.

(2) To the raising from the dead Irenaeus—although in terms less definite and precise than those he and others of the early fathers employ when speaking of exorcisms and cures—bears his testimony: “with much fasting and prayer the spirit of the dead returned” (Contra Haer. ii. 31); and again: “before now, as we have said, even the dead have been raised up, and have remained with us many years” (Contra Haer. ii. 32). As individual instances of this wonder as they occur in the course of our period we may take the following. Julian, who suffered martyrdom at Antioch in the Diocletian persecution, raised a dead man to life (Acta SS. ad d. 9 Jan.), and St. James, bishop of Nisibis (Antiochia Mygdonica) A.D. 325, a man who was brought to him, as dead, with a view to obtaining money (presumably to defray the expenses of burial), and who really died while counterfeiting death (Acta SS. ad d. 15 Jul.). St. Martin of Tours restored to life a catechumen who had died in his monastery unbaptized, by throwing himself upon the dead body and praying earnestly for its restoration (Newman, on Miracles, p. xxxii.; from Sulpicius Severus, who subsequently knew the subject of this miracle, and asserts that he lived for many years), and on another occasion a slave who had hanged himself (ibid. p. xxxiii.). Hilary of Poitiers raised a child to life who had died unbaptized (Fortunatus in Migne, Patrol. Lat. ix. 190; Acta SS. ad d. 13 Jan.). Marcellus, abbat of a monastery of the Acoemetæ, near Constantinople, A.D. 446, a monk (Fleury, xxvii. 30), and Gelasius, abbat of a monastery in Palestine, A.D. 452, a child (Fleury, xxviii. 38). Germanus of Auxerre, when at Ravenna, raised a man from the dead (Acta SS. ad d. 31 Jul.; Vie du grand St. Germain, par Dom Viole); St. Benedict of Nursia, a boy (Greg. M. Dial. ii. 32); St. Bavo of Ghent, A.D. 653, a man (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.); St. Walaricus, abbat of a monastery on the Somme, A.D. 622, one who had been unjustly hanged (ibid.); St. Wulfram, bishop of Sens, A.D. 720, five Frisian youths who had been hanged as a sacrifice to the gods (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 1).

(3) Miracles of deliverance, protection, succour—called forth as they were by the dangers and vicissitudes to which men were constantly exposed, and the various needs to which they were subjected—afford a series of wonders which, ranging downwards from the deliverance of cities from siege or assault, or of districts from inundation, to the multiplication of corn in a granary, or of wine or beer in a cask, differ widely from one another in respect of their object and importance, and the sphere they affect, and at times degenerate into little else than a display of miraculous power for its own sake—therein betraying their lack of the requisites of a true miracle: “miraculum si piâ utilitate aut necessitate caveat, eo facto suspectum est” (Gerson, de Distinct. Ver. Mir.).

Of miracles of this class no instances are given us by the early fathers in their general notices of the deeds of mercy wrought by the true disciples of Christ, and we have to pass on to the more detailed accounts of later times. The raising of the siege of Nisibis well illustrates the protective power which living saints were enabled to exercise. Sapor II. of Persia was besieging the city. The inhabitants in their alarm appealed to their bishop, St. James. In answer to the supplications he offered, swarms of gnats attacked the besiegers, their horses and elephants, irritating both the latter to such a pitch of frenzy that they broke loose. To increase his discomfiture the Persian king mistook the bishop, when he appeared on the walls in his purple and with his diadem on his head, for the Roman emperor, and thereupon raised the siege (Acta SS. ad d. 15 Jul.). According to Theophanes (Chronographia, pp. 52, 53) the bishop's prayers had the further result of bringing famine and pestilence upon the besiegers when returned to their own land; with this miracle we may compare the deliverance of Paris from the Huns through the prayers of St. Geneviève (Acta SS. ad d. 3 Jan.). The miracle wrought by Gregory Thaumaturgus on the banks of the river Lycus furnishes an instance of the exercise of this power in another direction. The bishop having been appealed to by the inhabitants of a certain district to deliver them from the calamities to which they were from time to time exposed through the overflowing of the river Lycus, made a journey to the place, and, invoking the name of Christ, planted his staff at the particular spot where the stream was wont to burst through the mound which had been erected on its bank to prevent its encroachments. The staff became a tree; the water rose as usual, but henceforth never passed the tree (Gregory of Nyssa, t. ii. pp. 991, 992). This miracle had its ethical result in the conversion of the inhabitants who were heathens (Newman, on Mir. p. xxvii.; Fleury, vi. c. 14). Similar miracles were wrought by Hilarion at Epidamnus (Gretser, de Cruce, ii. 63), by Severinus, A.D. 475, in Noricum (ibid. Acta SS. ad d. 8 Jan.), by Fridrian, A.D. 578, at Lucca (Greg. M. Dial. iii. 9), and by Attala, A.D. 627, a monk of Bobbio, in Italy (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.).

As a rule the miracles we read of as belonging to this class were confined to a narrow sphere of beneficence, having been wrought for the good of small communities, and frequently individuals. Thus we find St. Hilary cleansing the Insula Gallinaria (Isola d'Arbenga) of serpents (Fortunatus in Migne, Patrol. Lat. ix. 190); St. Martin of Tours, when in his missionary zeal he had set fire to a heathen temple, successfully repelling the flames from an adjoining house (Newman, on Mir. p. xxxiv.); St. Maur walking on the water to save the life of his friend Placidius (Greg. M. Dial. ii. 7); Germanus of Auxerre restoring a stolen valise to its owner (Acta SS. ad d. 31 Jul.; Vie du grand St. Germain); St. Benedict of Nursia (Greg. M. Dial. ii. 6), and Leutfred, abbat of a monastery near Evreux, A.D. 738 (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 1), causing iron to swim; Honoratus, abbat of Fondi, A.D. 550, by the sign of the cross, arresting on the hill-side a huge fragment of rock which threatened in its fall to overwhelm his monastery (Greg. M. Dial. i. 1; Gretser, de Cruce, iv. 57).

In special connexion with their needs, whether on their missionary journeys, or at home, we may note the miraculous power monks possessed of causing water to flow in dry places by the simple expedient of planting a staff in the ground or of striking it, or, as the case might be, the rock with a rod—examples of which we find in the lives of Richarius, abbat of Centulles, A.D. 645 (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.), Furseius of Lagny, A.D. 650 (ibid.) and Wulfram of Sens (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 1)—, as well as of multiplying wine or beer in the cask—of the exercise of which gift numerous instances occur in the Acta SS. Benedict.—and of quenching the flames when fire had chanced to break out in a monastery or convent, as may be seen in the Lives of Sulpicius of Bourges, A.D. 644 (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.), and Leutfred of Evreux (ibid. saec. iii. pt. 1).

2. Miracles of power, wrought, (1) in confirmation of Christianity, (2) of orthodoxy, (3) In punishment of evildoers, (4) In illustration of gifts bestowed upon men in reward for pious enterprises.

The ethical character which attaches to such miracles as find a place in one or other of these categories proves them to be not only exhibitions of power (δυνάμεις), but also signs (σημεία).

The forms which miracles of power assumed in the early church were, as has been said, the speaking with tongues, prevision of events, and the seeing of visions. With regard to the gift of tongues—one of no long continuance in the church—it may suffice to quote the words of Irenaeus: καθὼς καὶ πολλῶν ἀκούομεν ἀδελφῶν ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ προφητικὰ ἔχοντων καὶ παντοδαπαῖς γλώσσαις λαλούντων: and with regard to that of prevision—a gift which on the contrary was long continued to the saints of the Church—we may give, as far as primitive times are concerned, the testimony of the same writer: οἱ δὲ πρόβησις ἔχουσι τῶν μελλόντων (Contra Haer. ii. 32). The gift of seeing visions—one of no shorter duration, but of far wider significance than the last named—we reserve for consideration by itself. Of other miracles of power such as later saints wrought, whether as signs or as simple wonders (τέρατα), and of which examples will now be given, we find no mention in the writings of the early fathers concerning the church of their times.

(1) Amongst miracles wrought in confirmation of Christianity we may place those which Gregory Thaumaturgus performed upon the occasion of his being forced, through storm and the approaching fall of night, to take refuge, together with his companions in travel, in a heathen temple which happened to be famous for its oracles. Having invoked the name of Christ and signed the cross, the bishop, we read, spent the night in praising God. In the morning the priest of the temple found upon his arrival that the demons had forsaken their shrine. Gregory informed him that he could bring them back as well as expel them. Challenged to perform the former feat, he wrote upon a piece of paper the words "Gregory to Satan—enter," and handed them to the priest who placed them upon the altar. Forthwith the demons gave evidence of their return. To satisfy the priest still farther as to the truth of Christianity, Gregory accepted a challenge to move, by means of his word alone, a large stone which happened to lie near. He at once moved it, and thus convinced his opponent (Newman, on Mir. xxvi.). Hilarion wrought a remarkable miracle of this class at Gaza. A Christian named Italicus, who bred horses for the chariot-races, applied to Hilarion to help him against a rival who made use of magic to check the speed of Italicus's horses, and thus to secure the victory for his own steeds. The saint, although at first unwilling to lend his aid in so trivial a matter, acceded to the request and sent Italicus the vessel he was wont to use in drinking filled with water, wherewith horses, chariot, and charioteers were to be sprinkled. This done, the Christian's horses, flying like the wind, easily won the race. Whereupon the pagan party raised a loud shout: "Marnas (their god) is conquered by Jesus Christ" (Fleury, xii. 17; cf. Hieron. Ep. 7, ad Laet.). Of this class also is the miracle St. Martin of Tours wrought, in answer to a challenge from a pagan, in averting from himself by the sign of the cross a falling pine (Sulp. Sev. Vita Mart. 10; Fleury, xvi. 31).

(2) As confirmatory of orthodoxy we may note two miracles which St. Arnulph, who was put to death at Rheims in the beginning of the 6th century, wrought when in Spain. Having received a command from the king of the Visigoths, who wished to test the saint's powers, to rid the land of a serpent whose breath was of so fiery a nature as apparently to dry up water, St. Arnulph was conducted to the serpent's lair, where he laid his stola upon the head of the monster, and bidding him follow led him to a pond and forbade him ever to leave it or thenceforth to injure any living creature. In the same pond lay the body of a man who had died a violent death. Upon the saint's approach the dead man prayed to be delivered from his miserable resting-place. St. Arnulph at once raised him and buried him in a fitting grave. These miracles made such an impression upon the king and his courtiers that they forsook their Arianism and accepted the Catholic faith (Acta SS. ad d. 18 Jul.).

(3) As an example of a miracle wrought in punishment of evildoers we may take the following. When St. Willibrord, A.D. 739, was on a missionary journey, he with his company sought rest one day in a field. The owner of the land proceeded to drive him away, refusing to listen to his remonstrances or to drink with him in token of amity. "Then," exclaimed the saint, "drink not." Consequently the man lost the power of drinking while suffering all the pangs of thirst, nor did he regain it till he had confessed his sin to the saint upon his return in the course of a year (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 1).

(4) In illustration of the gifts bestowed upon men for their enterprise and piety, we may refer to the miracles of power St. Benedict of Nursia wrought, the record of which is to be found in the second book of pope Gregory's Dialogues, e.g. the saint's defeat of an attempt made to poison him (ii. 3); his miraculous detection of an infraction of the monastic rules on the part of some of his monks (ii. 12), and of theft on the part of a messenger (ii. 18); his enabling two monks to carry a heavy fragment of rock (ii. 9); with which miracles we may compare others of the same class wrought by St. Columban (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.).

As instances of miracles of power falling in none of the above categories, and appearing rather in the light of simple wonders, we may note the following: St. Macarius the elder, A.D. 356, causes a human skull he found in the desert to speak (Acta SS. ad d. 11 Jan.; Fleury xiii. 38), and Severinus of Noricum, A.D. 475, a dead priest (Acta SS. ad d. 8 Jan.); St. Mary the Egyptian, A.D. 421, after signing the cross walks on the waters of the Jordan (A. Butler's Lives of the Saints, s. v.); Hermenlandus, abbot of a monastery near Nantes, A.D. 720, by the use of the same means lights his lamp (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. i.), and St. Gudule of Brussels, A.D. 712, by prayer her candle (Acta SS. ad d. 8 Jan.), while likewise after prayer two monks of Bobio are able to carry the trunk of a large tree (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.).

Before quitting the subject of wonders wrought by living saints we shall do well to note first, the aspect in which the workers of miracles regarded their achievements, and the causes to which they attributed them. When no answer was accorded to his prayers respecting the cures he was called upon to perform, Pachomius used to comfort himself with the reflection that often God shews more favour in refusing than in granting our requests (Fleury, xv. 60). Germanus of Auxerre displayed a like humility in attributing the cures he worked to the means he employed, and not least to the relics he bore about his person (Vie du grand St. Germain, par Dom Viole). Secondly, we may note the acknowledgment on the part of those who fully believed in and themselves recorded contemporary miracles, that those who wrought them were liable to be unduly elated by their own performances. Thus pope Gregory reminds Augustine, in respect of the miracles that saint had wrought in England, that the working of miracles was no requisite for obtaining a place amongst the elect (Ep. xi. 28).

II. Wonders wrought by Relics.

The relics of a saint perpetuated the benefits which the saint himself during his lifetime had conferred upon those who stood in need of healing or succour. [RELICS.] The translation, again, of a saint's body, for the purpose of obtaining for it a safer or more honourable resting-place, frequently gave rise to a display of its thaumaturgic virtues (e.g. Translatio S. Severini, Acta SS. ad d. 8 Jan.). We must note that, unlike those which were wrought by living saints, miracles due to relics form no continuous chain reaching from the earliest to the latest portion of our period, originating as they did in the latter half of the 4th century. The church, however, was prepared to believe in the working of miracles by relics through the operation of various causes: first, by the regard she had long paid to the remains of martyrs; secondly by the association of these remains—placed as they were beneath the altars of churches—with the mysteries: "Episcopus, qui super mortuorum hominum, Petri et Pauli, secundum nos, ossa veneranda . . . offert Domino sacrificia, et tumulos eorum, Christi altaria arbitratur" (Hieronym. ii. adv. J. v. p. 153); thirdly, by the prevalence of a notion, of heathen origin, that the souls of the departed lingered about the graves in which the bodies rested (Lactant. ii. 2; Greg. M. Dial. ii. 38). Perhaps also in accounting for a readiness to believe in the virtue of that which was inanimate and possessed no powers of volition, we must not wholly eliminate even from the mind of the populace the effect of the teaching of philosophy that the Deity Himself wrought by inherent virtue rather than by will—φύσει ὃν βουλῆσει;—while as an influence acting immediately and most effectually in bringing about this belief we must place the example of notable men such as Ambrose, Augustine, Basil and Chrysostom.

1. Miracles of beneficence. (1) Exorcism, healing; (2) Raising the dead; (3) Deliverance, protection, succour.

(4) Exorcisms and miraculous cures wrought. 1. By the bodies of saints. 2. By objects brought into contact with or proximity to the bodies of saints, living or dead. (a) The garments of saints or other objects possessed by saints. (b) Cloths laid upon the bodies of dead saints. (c) The candles which illuminated or the lamps which were suspended above the tomb of a saint. (d) The dust which gathered upon the tomb. (e) Water with which the tomb was washed. (f) The fabric and furniture of the church which held the relics.

1. By saints' bodies.

Many miracles were wrought by St. Stephen's relics.* And first upon their discovery at Caphargamala near Jerusalem, in consequence of a twofold revelation. The town of Calama had possessed relics of St. Stephen for about eight years, and that of Hippo for less than two years, when St. Augustine made the assertion that many books would have to be written in order to recount all the miracles of healing—to say nothing of others—which had been wrought by means of these relics during this space of time in the two districts of Calama and Hippo, and that of those which had taken place in the latter district alone nearly seventy accounts had already been written (De Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, § 20).

For further examples of miraculous cures wrought by saints' bodies we may refer to the following instances: the cures which took place at Milan, after the discovery made by St. Ambrose of the bodies of SS. Gervasius and Protasius, of the blind Severus [RELICS, p. 1769], and of demoniacs and other sick people upon their touching the cloths which lay upon the relics, or by means of the shadow the relics cast when borne through the streets of the town (Ambros. Ep. xxii. 9); the healing of a leper at Alexandria by the body of Elisha, A.D. 456 (Theoph. 176); the cure of a blind man who on touching the covering of the bier of St. Theuderius found blood flow from his eyes and received sight (Ado Viennensis in Migne, Patrol. Lat. cxiii. 447); of a blind woman at the funeral of St. Aigulphus of Lerins, A.D. 675 (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.); of five blind persons and two with shrunken limbs, at St. Martin's tomb at Tours (Greg. Turon. de Mir. Mart. i. 12. 25; ii. 44, 58; iv. 42); of a palsied man at the tomb of Germanus, bishop of Paris (De Glor. Confessor. 90); frequent cures of ague at the tomb of St. Geneviève (ib. 91); one of toothache at that of St. Medard near Soissons (ib. 95); and various miracles of healing wrought by St. John Baptist's head at Emesa (Theoph. 665).

2. By objects brought into contact with, or proximity to, the bodies of saints, living or dead.

Miracles wrought by such means were, according to Gregory the Great, likely to make a deeper impression upon the popular mind than those which were wrought by the actual bodies of saints (Dial. ii. 38); and for this reason: in the latter case they might be regarded as wrought, in answer to prayer, by the saint himself whose spirit was supposed to hover about its former tenement.

(a) Saints' garments or possessions.

The tunic of St. John the Evangelist, preserved in Rome, worked many miracles (Vita Greg. M. auctore Jo. Diacono, lib. iii. 59). The shoes of St. Gall, A.D. 646, healed a man, to whom they were given after the saint's death, of contraction of the limbs (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.); those of St. Cuthbert, A.D. 687, one afflicted with paralysis (ibid.). The bed on which St. Gertrude, abbess of a convent at Nivelles in Brabant, A.D. 658, had been wont to sleep, wrought cures (ibid.), as did also the fringe or threads of a chasuble which Nicetius, bishop of Lyons, had worn (Greg. Turon. de Vita Patr. viii. 5). The keys of St. Peter wrought many cures at Rome, "super aegros positae multis solent miraculis coruscare" (Greg. M. Ep. i. 26, 30, 31).

* So many indeed were wrought in the course of the ages as to give rise to a proverb: "Whoever pretends to have read all the miracles of St. Stephen, he lies" (Freulphus apud Basnage, Hist. des Juifs, tom. vii. p. 249, Gibbon, xxviii.).

(b) Cloths laid upon the bodies of dead saints.

From the habit of regarding cloths (BRANDEA) which had been laid upon the bodies of dead saints in order to obtain virtue from them, as possessed of properties equally miraculous with those of the body itself, it is frequently difficult, in the absence of any specific term, to determine whether the terms generally used to designate relics refer to the actual remains of the saints, or to objects which had been brought into contact with or proximity to them, and amongst these to relics manufactured, so to speak, like the brandea. To give an instance of cloths thus transmuted into relics, cloths were laid upon the face of Meletius of Antioch, on the occasion of his funeral at Constantinople, A.D. 381, and distributed amongst the people as prophylactics (Fleury, xviii. 2). And in a less formal manner handkerchiefs (oraria) and garments in use were cast upon relics, e.g. upon those of SS. Gervasius and Protasius (Ambr. Ep. xxii. 9), in order to invest them with remedial properties. We read also that threads frayed from a handkerchief (facietergium) which had been used to cover the face of Nicetius, bishop of Lyons, on the day of his death, when laid upon an altar, cured an epileptic who prayed before it (Greg. Turon. de Vit. Patr. viii. 8).

(c) The candles which illuminated, or lamps which were suspended above the tomb of a saint. [OIL. HOLY.]

Dust from the tomb of St. Hilary of Poitiers was the means of cleansing two lepers, bestowing sight upon a blind person, and soundness of limb upon two persons afflicted with withered hands (Fortunatus in Migne, Patrol. Lat. xciv. 6, 7; Acta SS. ad d. 13 Jan.). Dust from the tomb of martyrs in Lyons, when gathered in a spirit of true faith, cured the infirm (Greg. Turon. de Gl. Martyr. i. 50), as also that from the tomb of Modoaldus, bishop of Treves, A.D. 640 circ. (Acta SS. ad d. 12 Maii). By dust from St. Martin's tomb at Tours, Avitus, bishop of Auvergne, and two youths got cured of fever, several persons of dysentery, and Gregory of Tours himself of a violent fit of faceache, of the pangs of which the bishop betrays a lively remembrance in the eulogy he passes upon this particular form of the Turonensian relics: "O theriacam inenarrabilem! O pigmentum ineffabile! O antidotum laudabile! O purgatorium, ut ita dicam, coeleste!" (de Mir. S. Mart. ii. 51; iii. 60).

(e) Water with which the tomb was washed.

During the prevalence at Tours of the epidemic already mentioned, several persons were cured of dysentery by the water with which St. Martin's tomb was washed in preparation for Easter (Greg. Turon. de Mir. S. Mart. ii. 51). Similar curative virtues attached to the water with which the corpse of a saint had been washed; instance the cure of a demoniac by this means (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.; Vita S. Cuthberti).

(f) The fabric and furniture of the church which held the relics.

A boy suffering from the effects of a poisoned dart was cured upon kissing the threshold of St. Martin's basilica, in accordance with a well-known ecclesiastical custom, prevalent alike in the East and West, and alluded to by Chrysostom (tom. xxx. in ii. ad Cor.) and Prudentius (Hymnus de S. Laurentio). Sidonius Apollinaris (Ep. i. 5) tells a friend that he lost the sense of his debility when prostrate upon the threshold of the Vatican basilica in Rome. In the neighbourhood of Bordeaux, horses were cured of disease by being marked with the key of the door of a chapel which was dedicated to St. Martin, and which held his relics (Greg. Turon. de Mir. S. Mart. iii. 33).

(2) Raising the dead.

For examples of this wonder as wrought by means of relics, see RELICS, p. 1777. To these we may add the instance of a man who was raised to life at the tomb of St. Geneviève of Paris (Greg. Turon. de Gl. Confess. 91).

(3) Deliverance, protection, succour.

The belief in the efficacy of relics to secure, whether for the individual believer or the whole population of a city, deliverance from or protection against all ills, was equally prevalent, and of the same date as its origin with the belief in their curative virtues.

As instances of this belief, we may note that the inhabitants of Rome regarded the relics of SS. Peter and Paul as safeguards to their city. [PATRON SAINTS.] In the same light the people of Nisibis regarded the relics of their bishop, St. James, attributing, indeed, to the removal of them by Julian the loss of their town to the Persians (Fleury, xv. 44).

As examples of actual deliverance from danger arising respectively from hostile assault, infectious disease, inundations, and storms, we may mention the following instances. When a band of rebellious monks belonging to the monastery of St. Sabas in Palestine were on their way to attack the monastery, they were seized with blindness, and unable to reach their destination. This deliverance of the abbat and his party was attributed to the presence of the relics of St. Sabas (Fleury, xxxiii. 3). In the time of Gregory of Tours, the populations of several districts of Gaul were visited with a plague of an infectious character, amongst these, the province of Prima Germania. The town of Rheims, however, escaped, by virtue of the pall or covering of St. Remigius's tomb, which was carried in procession, with the accompaniment of crosses and candles, round the town (Greg. Turon. de Gl. Confess. 79). Gregory himself, when the disease had reached Auvergne, sought and obtained protection against it at the tomb of St. Julian (de Mir. Martyr. ii. 45). On the occasion of an inundation, caused by the overflowing of the Adige, at Verona, in the 6th century, a large crowd assembled in the church, and before the tomb of St. Zeno, bishop of Verona (Martyr. Rom. 12 April.), to beseech his protection. The waters surged up round the edifice to the height of the windows, blocking up the door, but did not penetrate into the church or endanger the lives of the supplicants (Greg. M. Dial. iii. 19). By the erection of a shrine with the usual accompaniment of relics, the frequenters of a festival held yearly in the Cevennes, were delivered from storms which had become a matter of certain

Besides affording deliverance from, and protection against, ills, relics could confer positive benefits. Thus at Nursia in Umbria, the carrying of the robe of Eutychius, formerly abbat of a neighbouring monastery, round the fields, in seasons of drought, invariably produced rain (Greg. M. Dial. iii. 15).

This belief in the miraculous virtues of relics led to the practice of carrying relics, as the Jews of old their ark, into battle. Thus the Frankish princes required their army chaplains to carry them at the head of their forces (Carlomanni, capit. i. ann. 742, c. 2; Caroli M. capit. viii. ann. 803); Chilperic had them carried before him when he entered Paris (Greg. Turon. vi. 27); and an Eastern king, according to a story Gregory of Tours repeats, went so far as to insert the thumb of St. Sergius in his own right arm, and was able, as a reward for his faith, by raising his arm, to conquer his enemies (Hist. vii. 31). And apart from this public and official use of relics, many were wont to carry them about their person for their own individual protection against dangers in general, especially such as might arise in travelling. Gregory of Tours illustrated the practice and the benefit resulting from it in his own case. When he was on a journey from Burgundy to Auvergne, a thunderstorm came on. Plucking some relics he carried from his bosom he held them up in the direction of an ominous-looking cloud. The cloud parted in two, and no harm befell the travellers (de Gl. Martyr. i. 84). Upon another occasion he extinguished a fire by producing a cross, which contained relics of the Virgin, the Apostles, and St. Martin (de Gl. Martyr. i. 11). In Gregory the Great's epistles frequent mention is made of relics being sent by that prelate to various individuals, amongst these to Childebert, Rechared, and Constantina, the wife of the emperor Maurice, which were to be worn round the neck as safeguards against physical ills, and for the sake of the spiritual benefit they were calculated to bestow, e.g. (1) keys of St. Peter, together with which, as a rule, was included a minute portion of his chains (Ep. i. 26, 30, 31, iii. 48, vi. 6, ix. 52, 122, xii. 7); (2) chains of St. Paul, i.e. particles filed off from (Ep. iv. 30); (3) crosses, containing relics, e.g. (a) particles of St. Peter's chains (Ep. iii. 33), (b) wood of the cross, and hair of the Baptist (Ep. ix. 122); (4) the gridiron, i.e. pieces of, on which St. Lawrence was tortured to death (Ep. iii. 33). With this use of relics as safeguards we may compare the like practice of wearing a portion (lectio) of the gospels suspended round the neck for the sake of protection (Jo. Chrysost. tom. xix. ad Antioch.), and of placing one on the head to obtain a cure (Aug. in Johan. c. 7).

2. Miracles of Power wrought by Relics. (1) In attestation of the righteousness of the innocent, and the guilt of the wrong-doer. (2) In punishment of those who treated relics with contempt, and appearing in either case in the light of signs.

(1) Gregory of Tours relates the two following instances: A priest who had taken refuge in the church of St. Martin at Tours, and was there put into chains, was proved to be innocent by the fact that his chains fell off him, and could not be made to remain on him when replaced (de Mir. S. Mart. i. 23). On the other hand, a priest who had falsely asserted his innocence before the tomb of St. Maximin in Treves fell down dead (de Gl. Conf. 93). For a similar instance occurring in Bourges, see Greg. Turon. de Gl. Martyr. i. 34, and for another in Milan, Fleury, xxi. 54; and compare pope Gregory's words: "Ad extincta namque eorum corpora . . . perjuri veniunt et daemonio vexantur" (Dial. iv. 6).

(2) The power of relics to punish those who treated them with contempt is thus illustrated. When the relics of St. Babylas, bishop of Antioch, had been removed at the emperor Julian's command from Daphne, where their presence was supposed to render dumb the oracles of Apollo, the temple of Apollo caught fire, and no traces of it were left, A.D. 354 (Ruf. i. 35, 36; Sozom. v. 18, 19; Theoph. pp. 76, 77). During the troubles with which the 6th century drew to its close in France, a basilica which stood near Agen, on the Garonne, and held the relics of the martyr Vincentius (of that town), was set on fire. Of those who had done the deed, some were seized with madness, some were scorched with lightning, some inflicted wounds on themselves, some drowned themselves in the river, and others were tormented with various diseases (Greg. Turon. vii. 35; de Gl. Martyr. i. 105). We read of similar judgments in the instance of a count, who threatened to fire St. Martin's basilica (de Mir. S. Mart. ii. 27); a councillor who had suggested the partial demolition of a church (de Gl. Martyr. i. 92); a man who neglected to deliver relics when warned in dreams to do so (i. 42); a queen who stole some (Eddius, 33-38; Robertson, Ch. Hist. ii. 67); a Lombard who was about to make an incision in a key of St. Peter's (Greg. M. Ep. vii. 26); a band of Lombards who attempted to drag some monks away from a tomb (Dial. i. 4).

Other miracles of this class may be regarded in the light of wonders, such, for instance, as indicate the possession on the part of relics of a power (1) to postpone, with reference to themselves, the process of decay. Thus Hilarion's body ten months after death was wholly free from corruption and gave forth a sweet fragrance (Jer. t. ii.; Newman, on Mir. p. xxxii.). When the body of Amandus, bishop of Maestricht, A.D. 679, was translated, forty years after its burial, it was found to have so little perished in the interim that blood flowed from the gums when some teeth were extracted, while the beard and nails had actually grown (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.). See also in reference to St. Euphemia, Evagr. ii. 3; Fleury, xxviii. 1. (2) To increase in bulk, e.g.: Some dust taken from St. Martin's tomb at Tours so increased in quantity as to fill, and even force its way through the lid of, the box in which it had been placed (Greg. Turon. viii. 15). (3) To exercise a will and purpose. When the corpse of St. Theodorus was borne out to burial, it could be moved in no other direction than that of the saint's monastery (Ado Viennensis in Migne, Patrol. Lat. cxxiii. 448). (4) To vindicate their sanctity. Gregory the Great alludes to a story current about his predecessor St. Leo, who, to convince some who were sceptical on the subject of such relics, tore a "brandem" with a pair of pincers. From the rent thus made blood flowed (Ep. iv. 30). All that is here said of other relics may be said of relics of the Holy Cross.

III. Wonders wrought by the Eucharist.

Partly from the solemnity of the rite, and partly from its intimate connexion as a mark of church membership with the doctrines of the Catholic faith, the miracles which were wrought by the Eucharist appear in the light of signs and of punitive miracles rather than, or at least as often as, in the light of works of mercy, whereas in the case of those wrought by saintly agency or the means we have hitherto noticed, miracles of beneficence preponderate over those of an opposite description. Especially, too, must we note that the miracles the Eucharist wrought, it wrought not only as a sacrament, but as that of the Catholic faith in contradistinction to the rite and in condemnation of the doctrines, of an heretical creed.

1. Miracles of beneficence. (1) Exorcism, healing; (2) Deliverance, protection, succour.

(1) A girl possessed of an evil spirit upon receiving the Eucharist from St. Austregisile of Bourges, A.D. 624, at once ceased to shout and rave (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.); and a singer in a church choir upon receiving it from Sulpicius, bishop of the same see, A.D. 644, revived when exhausted and in a prostrate condition from a conflict with demons (ibid.). The slaves and cattle of a tribune at Hippo were freed from sufferings inflicted by demons upon their owner's partaking of the Eucharist (Aug. de Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, § 6). (2) By means of the Eucharist a child was preserved from perishing by fire. At the time of the occurrence of the miracle—the reign of Justinian—it was customary to distribute amongst the young children of Christian parents such fragments of the Eucharistic bread as remained after communion. [EULOGIAE.] By accident a Jewish child, mingling with his Christian companions, received and ate one of these fragments. The father of the boy—a glass-blower by trade—was so enraged that he shut his son into his furnace in order not only to kill him but to destroy all traces of him. The child, however, was saved, and the miracle had its ethical result in the conversion of the mother, who was baptized together with her child (Migne, Dict. des Proph. et des Mirac. t. i. p. 641). The virtues of the Eucharist, as a means of succour, extended even to the dead. A young monk in St. Benedict's monastery, who had gone on a visit to his parents without obtaining the customary blessing from the saint before quitting the monastery, died on the day of his return. After burial his body was found to have been displaced and, when reburied, again displaced. St. Benedict then ordered it to be buried with the Host laid upon it, after which the corpse reposed in peace (Greg. M. Dial. ii. 24).

2. Miracles of power wrought (1) In condemnation of immorality; (2) of heresy.

(1) Gregory of Tours relates that as a deacon—a man of unholy life—was one day carrying the Eucharist into a church, the bread flew out of his hands and placed itself on the altar (De Gloriâ Martyr. i. 86). In the time of St.

Liudger, bishop of Münster in Westphalia, A.D. 809, a woman, living in illicit connexion with a priest, sent a jar of honey to a church, where it was placed behind the altar. As soon as the bishop, who was officiating on the occasion, began the mass, the jar broke (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iv. pt. 1). (2) Certain members of the Donatist sect, in token of their contempt for the Catholics, once ordered the Eucharistic bread to be given to their dogs. Upon eating it the dogs went mad and bit their masters (Optatus Milev. de Schism. Donatist. bk. vi.). A woman receiving some of the Eucharistic bread of the Macedonians, to her alarm found that it had turned into stone (Sozomen, viii. 5; Theoph. 120).

As a wonder or prodigy wrought by the Eucharist we may note that according to Greg. of Tours (Hist. vi. 21), the Host on one occasion shed blood when broken.

The consecrated bread set aside and reserved [RESERVATION] was credited with similar if not equal powers of working miracles with that partaken of in communion. As constituting a means of grace, it was sinful to treat it from whatever motives with indifference, as may be seen from the following incident. A bishop named Marsius upon receiving the Eucharist from the hands of Melanius, bishop of Rennes, A.D. 530, let his portion fall into the folds of his robe, deeming it a mark of superior sanctity not to break his fast. The bread turned into a snake, which wreathed itself tightly round the bishop's waist and could not be got rid of till Melanius had spent a night in supplication on the sufferer's behalf, when it reverted to its original condition, in which form Marsius thankfully ate it (Acta SS. ad d. 6 Jan.).

Miracles were also wrought by holy baptism. St. Augustine (de Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, § 4) mentions the miraculous effect of baptism upon a surgeon afflicted with gout. St. Augustine further relates that an actor was cured of paralysis by this rite (§ 5). Theophanes records a similar cure in the instance of a Jew (Chronograph. 127). Sight was bestowed upon Othilia, afterwards an abbess in Alsace, on her baptism (Martyr. Rom. 13 Dec.). As a miracle of power, Theophanes relates that when Deuterius, an Arian bishop, A.D. 502, was about to baptize a catechumen after the Arian formula, "in the name of the Father in the Son," the water in the piscina suddenly dried up (Chronograph. 234).

IV. Wonders wrought by Pictures and Images.

(a) Pictures and images of our Lord and the saints.

In the controversy which was raised in the first half of the 8th century respecting pictures, one argument put forward in favour of their use was the fact that they possessed miraculous virtues. Heaven, it was urged, had wrought many miracles by means of pictures. Cures had been effected, charms broken, visions had been accorded. To this purport pleads Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, in a letter addressed, A.D. 726, to Thomas, bishop of Claudiopolis (Acta Concil. Nicaen. ii. Actio iv. in Mansi, xiii.). Such miracles, however, were confined to representations of our blessed Lord and the saints.

1. Miracles of beneficence. (1) Healing; (2) Protection, succour.

in Pisidia was wont to shed, at the point where the hand of the Virgin was represented, a sweet-smelling ointment. To this picture Germanus especially alludes as one whose miraculous virtues were attested by numerous witnesses (Mansi, xiii.; Fleury, xlii. 2). For the statue at Caesarea Philippi, see JESUS CHRIST, REPRESENTATION OF, p. 877. An image of our Lord on the cross which stood near the great gate of the imperial palace at Constantinople was supposed to possess miraculous virtues, and in fact was believed to have wrought a cure of hemorrhage similar to that mentioned in the Gospels. To the adoration paid to it on this score it owed indeed its destruction by the emperor Leo III. (Maimbourg, Histoire de l'Hérésie des Iconoclastes; Fleury, xlii. 3). John Damascene, after praying before an image of the Virgin, had his right hand, which had been cut off, miraculously restored (Robertson, Ch. Hist. ii. 84, 85).

(2) The victories which Heraclius won over the Persians were attributed to the fact of his carrying at the head of his legions images of our Lord and the Virgin Mary (Maimbourg, u. s.; cf. Fleury, xxxvii. 3); and the repulse of a Saracen army from the walls of Nicaea, A.D. 718, to the possession by that city of images of the saints (Theoph. 624, 625). For the destruction of the war machines of the Persians at the siege of Edessa, A.D. 621, by means of a portrait of Christ; see IMAGES.

2. Miracles of power.

A Jew stole a picture of our Lord from a church, and in token of his contempt for and hatred of the Person it represented, transfixed it with a dart. Forthwith blood began to flow from the picture, and in such quantity as to cover the Jew from head to foot. Whereupon he resolved to burn it, but the blood it had shed enabled its rightful owners to trace and bring condign punishment upon the thief (Sigeberti Gemblac. Chronicon, A.D. 560 in Migne, Patrol. Lat. clx. 105).

(b) Images of the cross.

As the portrait of a saint became endowed with miraculous powers by reason of the holiness of the individual therein portrayed, so representations of the cross obtained as such some measure at least of the virtues which attached to the true cross itself. Miracles of beneficence, healing, protection, succour, are attributed to such ordinary crosses, exactly similar to those attributed to the true cross itself. See Gretser, de Cruce, and his Hortus Cruis.

V. Wonders wrought by Celestial Visitants.

1. Miracles of beneficence. (1) Healing; (2) Deliverance, protection, succour.

(1) St. Cuthbert, bishop of Lindisfarne, A.D. 687, was cured of weakness in his knee by an angel who appeared to him on horseback (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.); and a nun in a convent at Pauvilly, in Normandy, of an ulcer in her throat after the hand of some invisible personage had been placed in support of her head, and a vision had been subsequently accorded to her of one clothed in the white robes of a virgin (Vita S. Austrebertae, Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 1). In short we may say that whatever wonders were attributed to living saints were also attributed to celestial visitants.

As wonders wrought by celestial visitants we may class (a) the presentation by them of gifts, e.g. of a magnificent vestment which the Virgin Mary presented to Ildefonsus, bishop of Toledo, to be worn on her festivals, in reward for his defence of the doctrine of her perpetual virginity (Baron. ad ann. 657. 53, 56; Robertson, ii. 58); (b) directions given by angels in visions or dreams respecting the building of churches or monasteries in all instances in which the miraculous was not confined to the apparition itself. Thus when the archangel Michael had thrice appeared, A.D. 709, to a bishop named Autbertus, bidding him found a church to his honour on the mount now known as St. Michael's mount, on the coast of Normandy, the bishop found a confirmation of the superhuman nature of the behest in the fulfilment of an appointed sign, and further instruction as to the exact dimensions of the church in its lines being left untouched by the dew which covered the top of the mount (Appar. S. Michaelis, Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 1).

VI. Wonders wrought apart from Human or Angelic Agency or the above-named Means.

Wonders of this kind, consisting as they do largely of instances of providential interference, whether merciful or punitive, rank in a different class from those wrought by saints or their relics, or by sacraments in contradiction to the laws of nature. Those, too, which are best attested are perhaps the least marvellous, although in different degrees—those which are most miraculous rest on manifestly insufficient testimony. Such phenomena as the fall of a shower, the death of an heresiarch, the interruption of a work by storm and volcanic disturbance, the apparition of a cross in the sky, may now be viewed, some as special providences, others as extraordinary coincidences; but at the time of their occurrence they were one and all unquestionably regarded as interpositions of Providence, intended to supply the needs or to confound the enemies of the faithful; and as such it is probable that they were deemed no less miraculous than many wonders wrought by living saints or by their relics after them; while many possessed the advantage of being widely known, whereas the knowledge of the others was often confined to the narrow sphere in which they had been wrought. With regard to such wonders as were rather of the nature of marvels or prodigies, it was different; of these some were in a measure signs, denoting as they did the piety of a saint when living, or the holiness of his memory when dead; many, however, were devoid of all ethical features, and provocative only of wonder, while few were well attested, resting as they often did on the authority of monkish traditions, or the testimony of solitary witnesses.

(a) Miraculous occurrences.

1. Miracles of beneficence. (1) Healing; (2) Deliverance, protection, succour.

(1) A body of Catholics living at Typasa in Mauritania, A.D. 484, for the crime of holding assemblies and refusing to communicate with an heretical bishop, had their right hands amputated and their tongues cut out by the roots by order of Hunneric, the Arian king of the Vandals. The miracle lay in the fact that on the third day they were able to speak as before. Three at least of the narrators of this miracle, viz. Aeneas of Gaza, a rhetorician and philosopher (in Theophrasto), the emperor Justinian (Cod. Justin. i. tit. 30), and count Marcellinus, his former chancellor (Chron. Marcellin.), were witnesses both of the mutilation inflicted, and the capacity to articulate in the case of some of these martyrs who were living in their time. Marcellinus adds that one of the confessors having been born dumb, spoke for the first time after the excision of his tongue. Procopius (de Bell. Vandal. i. 7) states that two—Gregory I. (Dial. iii. 32) that one—out of their number lost their supernatural power of speech through having lapsed into evil living. No contemporary authority gives the number of the confessors; in an old menology it was fixed at sixty (Victor Vitensis in Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii. 245; Gibbon, xxxvii.; Newman, on Mir. cc.-ccxiii.). Other examples of the preservation of speech after mutilation occur in the instances of Aigulphus of Lerins, A.D. 675, and his companions (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.), and Leger bishop of Autun, A.D. 678 (ibid.); while of miraculous healing of another kind, we find an example in the instance of a band of five Catholic slaves in Africa who, after having been beaten, not once, but on several occasions, almost to death, had their wounds invariably cured by the morrow (Fleury, xxviii. 58).^b

(2) As an example of protection and succour accorded to large bodies of men, we may take the miracle of the so-called thundering legion. When the emperor Marcus Aurelius was waging war against the Quadri, his troops on one occasion suffered greatly owing to the heat and from thirst. Amongst his soldiers were many Christians. Those who belonged to the Melitene legion fell on their knees in prayer; a shower of rain fell, refreshing and invigorating the Roman army, but terrifying and dispersing the enemy, to whom it had proved a storm of thunder and lightning. Such in the main is the account with which Eusebius (Hist. v. 5) prefaces the original statement of Claudius Apollinaris bishop of Hierapolis, in an apology addressed to Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 176, although no longer extant, and the few words in which Tertullian (Apol. 5, ad Scap. 4) alludes to the event. Dion Cassius (Hist. lxxi.), omitting all reference to the prayers of the Christians, speaks of the occurrence as “a wonderful and providential preservation,” which he attributes to magic, as Julius Capitolinus (in Marc. Aurel.) to the emperor’s prayers. The event itself is represented, with pagan features in the mode of rendering, on a bas-relief of the Antonine column in Rome. Manifestly, however, it is erroneous to derive the title “thundering legion” from this occurrence, as it already existed and was as old as the time of Augustus. Baronius’s explanation (Ann. 176, 20) is that the Christian soldiers were in all parts of the army, and after this were incorporated into the existing thundering legion (Newman, on Mir. cxiii.-cxix.; Migne, Dict. des Mir. t. i. p. 759).

As examples of protection afforded to individuals we may note the instance of Theotimus, bishop of Tomi, A.D. 400, who became invisible to his pursuers (Fleury, xxi. 5); St. Martin of Tours, the arm of whose assailant fell powerless (Sulp. Sev. Vita, 13); Armogastus, a young Catholic in Theodoric’s service, whose limbs were freed from their bonds on his signing the cross and invoking Christ (Fleury, xxviii. 59). Of protection against the fatal effects of poison we find an example in the instance of Sabinus, bishop of Canusium, A.D. 593 (Greg. M. Dial. iii. 5), also of Samson, bishop of Dol, A.D. 565 circ. (Acta SS. Ben. saec. i.); and of miraculous succour, under circumstances of difficulty or absolute want, in the instances of Clovis who, when marching against the Visigoths, was after prayer guided to the right place for crossing the Vienne by a stag which began to ford it (Greg. Turon. ii. 37), and of St. Columban and his companions, who were fed by ravens in a time of famine (Acta SS. Ben. saec. ii.). Comp. also the instance of a prior in Life of Austregisile (ibid.).

2. Miracles of power. (1) Punitive; (2) Marvels.

(1) Of this class was the fiery eruption on the rebuilding of the Temple of Jerusalem. The emperor Julian had given orders for the rebuilding of the Temple, having entrusted the superintendence of the work to his lieutenant Alypius, and himself issued invitations to the Jews of all countries to assemble at Jerusalem and aid him in accomplishing his purpose. Of the marvellous manner in which the work was interrupted and the imperial designs thwarted, we learn the particulars, some from one writer, some from another. A whirlwind arose, scattering heaps of lime and sand in every direction; a storm of thunder and lightning fell, melting in its violence the implements of the workmen; an earthquake followed, casting up the foundation of the old Temple, filling in the new excavations and causing the fall of buildings, especially the public porticoes beneath which the terrified multitude had sought shelter. When the workmen resumed their labours balls of fire burst out beneath their feet, not once only, but as often as they attempted to continue the undertaking. The fiery mass traversed the streets, repelling from the doors of a church, even with loss of life or limb, those who had fled to it for safety. This miracle has the support of contemporary writers. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. v. 4), and Ammianus Marcellinus (Hist. xxiii. 1); and of later historians Rufinus (Hist. i. 37), Socrates (iii. 20), Sozomen (v. 22), Theodoret (Hist. Eccl. iii. 20). See Warburton’s Julian; Gibbon, c. xxiii.; Newman, on Mir. clxxv.; Migne, Dict. des Mir. t. ii. p. 1115. With regard to the death of Arius, the event was regarded by the Catholic party in general as a direct interposition of Providence in their favour, and in answer to the prayers of the bishop of Constantinople and his clergy, and by Athanasius himself as a sufficient refutation of the Arian heresy (Athanas. Ded. Epist. ad Monachos, 3 Op. v. i. 344; Milman, Hist. of Christianity, bk. III. iv.). Amongst miracles of this class those of an anti-Arian complexion are indeed conspicuous. We may instance the story of an Arian bishop who was struck blind when about to force his way into a Catholic church (Greg. M. Dial. iii. 29); of a man who, when counterfeiting blindness at the instigation of an Arian bishop who wished to display his pretended powers of healing, became actually blind (Greg. Turon. ii. 3); and pope Gregory's account of the prodigies which attended the re-consecration for purposes of orthodox worship of an Arian church at Rome (Dial. iii. 30). For further examples of Divine judgments—for as such they were regarded at the time (Socr. vi. 19; Sozom. viii. 27)—we may refer to the various accidents, unwonted illnesses and sudden deaths which took place at Constantinople, A.D. 404, after the persecution which was raised against St. Chrysostom (Fleury, xxi. 48). That Divine visitations were not confined to this side of the grave, see Greg. M. Dial. iv. 51, 53, 54.

^b These cases of recovered speech after mutilation of the tongue have been investigated in a special treatise by the Hon. E. Twissleton, who has quoted several cases in modern times, authenticated by well-known surgeons, in which persons thus mutilated have been able to speak. [C.]

(2) Amongst marvels which were not specially connected with saints were the circumstances which led to the development of the angelic song, the Greek TRISAGION in the reign of Theodosius II. A child at Constantinople was caught up into the air, and on his return in the course of an hour reported that he had heard the heavenly host singing, ἅγιος ὁ Θεός, ἅγιος ἰσχυρός, ἅγιος ἀθάνατος (Mansi, t. vii. p. 1041); the fall, at Alexandria, of statues from their pedestals, proclaiming the death of the emperor Maurice and his sons (Theoph. 450); the filling of a piscina with water through some unknown agency (Greg. Turon. de Gl. Martyr. i. 24) and the mysterious strewing of the pavement before a saint's tomb with roses (De Mir. Mart. ii. 46).

(b) Miraculous appearances.

"They have visions," writes Irenaeus (Contra Haer. ii. 32), "when enumerating the gifts possessed by Christ's true disciples in his day." To quote the words of a historian who does not err on the side of credulity, "it is impossible to overlook the clear traces of visions and inspiration which may be found in the early fathers" (Gibbon, c. xv.). As the exercise of powers of healing and exorcism constituted the chief mode in which the early Christians exhibited in an active form the miraculous gifts which had been imparted to them for the good of others, so were visions no less the channel by means of which they became passive recipients of supernatural communications vouchsafed to them for their own edification and guidance. Thus the purport of visions was sometimes to allay the fears, to solve the doubts, to direct the steps of those who were in trouble or difficulty, sometimes to admonish the guilty, and sometimes to forewarn of approaching calamities. Nor were they restricted to those who are supposed to be the fitting recipients of communications of this sort—the hermit in his cave, or the monk in his cell—having been vouchsafed to men in general, to the young and old, to the lowly as well as to the great. During the first ages they constituted an important means towards the conversion of the pagan from his heathenism, the heretic from his schism. Tertullian writes: "Major paene vis hominum e visionibus Deum discunt" (De Animâ, 47), and Origen, "Many have come to Christianity through the medium of visions which occurred to them while awake or in dreams" (Contra Cels. i. 46).

1. Apparitions of Beings. (1) Angels; (2) Demons; (3) Departed Spirits; (4) Living Saints.

(1) The appearances of the archangel Michael —"qui universalis ecclesiae a Deo patronus et protector est institutus"—were numerous both in the East and the West, e.g. near Byzantium, near Colosse, on Monte Gargano, A.D. 500 circ., in Normandy (see above), A.D. 709 (Martyr. Rom. 8 Maii). An angel appeared to St. Theuderius directing him where to erect his monastery (Ado Vienn. in Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 447); two angels to Furseus, A.D. 650, admonishing him as abbat of a monastery that monks should pay less attention to the mortification of the body, and more to the cultivation of a humble, contented, and charitable disposition (Fleury, xxxviii. 28).

(2) As examples, we may take first the appearances of the evil one to St. Anthony in the guise of a woman, then of a black child; as a monk with leaves in his hands, when the saint was fasting; as a spirit calling himself the power of God, and lastly avowing himself to be Satan; and secondly, the appearance of demons to the same saint in the form of wild beasts and serpents uttering horrible cries (Newman, on Mir. xxix.; Fleury, viii. 7).

(3) First of scriptural saints. St. Stephen appeared, A.D. 420, to Pulcheria, sister of Theodosius II., informing her of the safe arrival of his relics (i.e. his right hand) from Jerusalem (Theoph. 133, 134); St. Barnabas, A.D. 484, to Anthimus, bishop of Constantia, in Cyprus, revealing to him the resting-place of his body, near Salamis, in that island (Fleury, xxx. 19). Secondly, of bishops and abbats. St. Ambrose on the night, being Easter Eve, on which he was laid out for burial appeared to the newly-baptized infants, varying the manner of his appearance, but to the parents of the children remaining invisible, even when pointed out. Again, on the day of his death he appeared to saints in the East, praying with them and laying his hands upon them, while in Florence he was frequently seen after his death, praying before the altar of a church he had built in that city (Paul. Vita, 48, 49, 50; Fleury, xx. 21). St. Benedict appeared after death to an abbat and prior of his order at Terracina instructing them as to the plan of a monastery they were about to build (Greg. M. Dial. ii. 22).

(4) As an example of the appearance of a living saint we read that a child who had fallen into a well was found sitting upon the surface of the water, and that his account was that St. Julian Sabas who at the time was being entertained by the mother of the child had appeared to him and borne him up (Fleury, xvi. 28). We find a similar story in the life of Theodosius of Palestine (Acta SS. ad d. 11 Jan.).

2. Visions of Purgatory, Hell, Heaven.

A vision the martyr Perpetua (Martyr. Rom. 7 Mar.) had of her brother, in whose behalf she had been moved to pray, first as suffering and in a place of darkness, and then as comforted and surrounded with light, has been supposed to refer to a state of purgatory (Robertson, i. 68; Milman, ii. 221). As indicative of the punishment of the wicked, an abbat in Auvergne had a vision of a stream of fire, and of men immersed in it bitterly bemoaning their sufferings. These had lost their footing when crossing a narrow bridge which spanned the stream, and were men who had been careless in the discharge of their spiritual duties. After this vision the abbot became stricter in the regulation of his monastery (Greg. Turon. iv. 33). Compare, as of similar signification, an hermit's vision of Theodoric the Ostrogoth being cast into the crater of a volcano (Greg. M. Dial. iv. 30). Visions of heaven were accorded amongst others to St. Furseius (Fleury, xxxviii. 28) and to Salvius, bishop of the Albigenses, as a place paved with gold and silver and illuminated by a cloud shining beyond the light of sun or moon (Greg. Turon. vii. 1).

3. Apparitions of Crosses. (1) In the air; (2) On the garments of men; (3) On animals.

(1) Constantine, when marching against Maxentius, A.D. 311, and in doubt to what deity he should apply for succour against an enemy whose forces outnumbered his own, saw in company with his whole army a luminous cross in the sky above the mid-day sun with this inscription, "In this conquer." The same night our Lord appeared to Constantine in a vision, shewed him a cross, and bade him fashion a standard after the pattern of it as a means of victory in his contest against Maxentius. Such is the account Eusebius gives in his Life of Constantine (i. 28-32), but not till twenty-six years after the occurrence, and which he professes to have heard from the emperor himself, who affirmed his statement with an oath. Socrates, Philostorgius, Gelasius, and Nicephorus speak of the phenomenon as seen in the sky; Sozomen and Rufinus in a dream, although on the authority of Eusebius they also mention the apparition in the sky. In a panegyric delivered immediately after the victory the speaker, who is a pagan, refers to "the omen" (Bar. Ann. ann. 312, 14), and ten years after another orator, Nazarius, also a pagan, alludes to "the common talk of all the Gallic provinces that hosts were seen who bore on them the character of divine messengers" (ap. Bar. Ann. 312, 11). Gibbon alludes to a medal extant in the last century bearing the figure of the labarum with the inscription, "In this sign thou shalt conquer" (Newman, on Mir. cxxxiii.; Gibbon, xx.). On the feast of Pentecost, May 7, A.D. 351, a cross appeared in the sky at Jerusalem, stretching from Mount Calvary to Mount Olivet, and shining with a brilliancy equal to that of the sun's rays. The apparition lasted for several hours; the whole city beheld it, and all, residents and visitors, Christians and unbelievers, alike joined in the acknowledgment that "the faith of the Christians did not rest upon the persuasive discourses of human wisdom, but upon the sensible proofs of divine intervention" (Cyril, Ep. ad Const. Imp.). Of this phenomenon Cyril, then patriarch of Jerusalem, wrote an account to the emperor Constantius, who at the time was fighting against Maxentius in Pannonia, where also, according to Philostorgius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 26), it was seen by the contending armies to the confusion of the pagan and the encouragement of the Christian host (Theoph. 62, 63; Migne, Diet. des Mir. tom. i. 247). To other appearances of the cross in the sky we may thus briefly refer. Gretser mentions two towards the beginning of the 4th century—one as seen by Gregory, bishop of Armenia, and the other by Tiridates, king of that country, and by his fellow-converts on the occasion of their baptism. Cedrenus another, to which Gregory Nazianzen alludes (Orat. v. 7), at Jerusalem on the occasion of Julian's attempt to rebuild the temple, as surpassing in point of brilliancy that recorded by Cyril (Hist. Compend. i. p. 537). The same writer mentions two appearances of a cross, which he terms σημεία, at Constantinople, one in the second, the other in the third year of the reign of Constantine Copronymus (ibid. ii. p. 5), while another was vouchsafed to St. Euphemia shortly before her martyrdom, which took place at Chalcedon in the Diocletian persecution (Martyr. Rom. 16 Sept.), "a symbol," writes Asterius, bishop of Amasea, "of the punishment she was to undergo."

(2) As examples of crosses appearing on the garments of men, we read that when the emperor Julian was entering Illyricum the vines appeared laden with unripe grapes, although the vintage had taken place, and that dew falling from them upon the garments of the emperor and his companions left upon them the imprint of crosses; a phenomenon which by some was supposed to portend that the emperor should perish prematurely like unripe grapes (Sozomen, H. E. i. 5). The appearance of the luminous cross in the sky on the occasion of Julian's attempt to rebuild the temple, was accompanied by the appearance on the bodies and garments of men of crosses which were luminous at night (Ruf. i. 37), in some instances of a dark colour (Theodor. iii. 20) and would not wash out (Soer. iii. 20). Nor was the phenomenon confined to Jerusalem, being seen in Antioch and other cities likewise (Theoph. 81; Cedren. Hist. Compend. i. 537). See Newman on Mir. clxxvi.; Migne, Diet. des Mir. t. ii. 1117. Crosses "as of oil" (σταυρία ἐλαϊώδη) appeared in Constantinople in the sixth year of the reign of Constantine Copronymus on the garments of men as they walked in the streets, and on the altarcloths of churches. Those whose clothes were thus marked were attacked with mortal illness. The pestilence which prevailed was such as to turn the capital into a desert. The Catholic party attributed both it and the portents to the iconoclasm of the emperor (Cedrenus, Hist. Compend. ii. 8; Migne, Diet. des Mir. i. 248).

(3) Of crosses appearing on animals we find the following instances. When the emperor Julian was inspecting the entrails of an animal he was offering in sacrifice, he beheld in them the figure of a cross encircled by a crown (Sozom. v. 2); φρικὴν παρέσχε καὶ ἀγωνίαν, writes Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. iv. 54). St. Placidus, when hunting a stag, beheld amidst its horns a luminous cross and the figure of the Crucified, and heard a voice saying: "Quid me persequeris, Placida? Ecce propter te adsum: ego sum Christus quem ignorans veneraris" (Niceph. iii. 19). St. Meinulphus also saw a cross amidst a stag's horns (Gobenus in Vita S. Meinulphi).

The above classification of apparitions and visions, according to the form of the one and the subject of the other, has placed in less prominence the notion, but not precluded a passing notice of their object and purpose. The use of apparitions and visions has been exemplified under other sections of our subject—for their use in admonishing the guilty, see section II. under miracles of power wrought by relics. For their use in animating the courage of the faithful we may refer to the visions by which Perpetua was sustained in prospect of her martyrdom (Rob. i. 68), and for their use as prognostics of approaching calamity we may instance those which were vouchsafed to the church in Africa, A.D. 480 circ., to prepare her for her persecution by the Vandals (ib. i. 500; Vict. Vit. ii. 6).

Lastly, in the eyes of the monkish and episcopal chroniclers of the dark ages celestial or atmospheric phenomena, such as comets, meteors, displays of the aurora borealis, wore the aspect of "wonders" (prodigia), especially when coincident with or preceding the deaths of saints, e. g. St. Liudger, A.D. 809 (Acta SS. Ben. saec. iv. pt. i.) or princes, e. g. Theodebald (Greg. Turon. iv. 9) Merovechus (v. 19), Gundobald (vii. 11), or the occurrence of plagues and pestilences (iv. 31). Certain concomitants of these phenomena, such as a shower of blood from the clouds besprinkling the garments of men and the interior walls of a house (vi. 14), and the conversion of the water of a pond into blood (viii. 25) do not it is true belong to the same natural order of things. [C. G. C.]

XANTIPPE, Sept. 23, commemorated in Spain with her sister Polyxena, disciples of St. Paul (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

XENODOCHIA. Guesthouses for the reception of strangers and pilgrims. [HOSPITALS.] There were four such of ancient foundation in Rome, which, having fallen into decay, were restored by pope Stephen II., A.D. 752-757, and furnished with all things needful both within and without. He also founded a "xenodochium" where a hundred poor men were fed daily (Anastas. § 228), and built two without the walls near St. Peter's, which he attached to the ancient "diaconiae" of the Blessed Virgin and St. Silvester (ibid. § 229). Pelagius II., A.D. 557-590, converted his own house into a guesthouse for poor and aged men (ibid. § 112). Belisarius, c. 540, erected a "xenodochium" in the Via Lata (ibid. § 102). We find these Roman guesthouses distinguished by different names, probably those of the founders, e. g. "xenodochium Valerii" (§ 274); "xenodochium Firmi," containing an oratory of the Virgin (§ 385), and adorned with gifts by Leo III. (§ 402); and the "xenodochium quod appellatur Tucium," containing an oratory of SS. Cosmas and Damian (§ 408). [PILGRIMAGE, § vii. p. 1641.] [E. V.]

XENOPHON, monk, "holy father," cir. 520, commemorated on Jan. 26 with his sons Arcadius and Joannes (Basil. Menol.; Daniel, Codex Liturg. iv. 251). [C. H.]

XEROPHAGIA (ξηροφαγία, aridus victus, dry food). This word, as expressive of the act or habit of living on dry food or a meagre diet, is in common use by ecclesiastical writers, both Greek and Latin, to denote the Christian rule of fasting. Tertullian compares its adoption by Christians for spiritual ends, to its practice by the heathen athletes for earthly victories (de Jejun. cc. i. xvii.). Ξηροφαγεῖν is employed of the Lenten fast in the fiftieth canon of the council of Laodicea, A.D. 390; of the fast in Holy Week by Epiphanius (Compend. Doct. Cath. vol. ii. pp. 295, 296, 361, ed. Paris, 1622), when bread and salt was the only solid food allowed, and water was drunk only in the evening. For the varieties of practice which existed with regard to fasting in the early church, see Socrates, Eccles. Hist. v. 22; Balsamon, Epist. de Jejun. in Cotelierii Eccles. Graec. Mon. tom. ii. p. 498, edit. 1681. [F. E. W.]

YEAR, THE ECCLESIASTICAL. The object of this article is to supplement that on CALENDAR [p. 256], by giving a complete account, according to the principal calendars, of the arrangement and designations of the several Sundays of the ecclesiastical year, as also of the Festivals in the weeks corresponding with them.

This Calendar presents an abnormal number of Sundays (57), in order to shew the full arrangement of these for both an early and late Easter, according to the position of which festival some either of the earlier or of the later Sundays in the Calendar would need to be omitted; it must be remembered, however, that in different years the correlation of Sundays would vary, inasmuch as those, whose place depends upon that of Easter, may occur more than a month earlier than in our Calendar, while other Sundays, dependent upon fixed festivals can only be a few days earlier or later in the year. While care has been taken to exclude festivals of later origin than the 9th century, the alternative names (mostly Latin) of festivals and Sundays, the precise period of the origin of which is uncertain, have generally been included, on account of their common use in early and mediaeval documents; and the Latin introits are also given for the same reason. Besides other obvious abbreviations the following have been used:—D. Dominica dies, Hebd. hebdomada, Sab. Sabbatum, fest. festum, mart. martyr, com. companion. An alphabetical index to the names of the Sundays and festivals is subjoined.

The chief authorities used in the compilation of the Calendar are: the ancient Roman (Rom.) and Greek (Gr.) Calendars to be found in Allatius (de Domin. et Hebd. Graecis); the Ambrosian (Amb.) and Mozarabic (Moz.) Calendars; the Sacramentary bearing the name of Gregory the Great (Greg.); the Armenian (Arm.) and Georgian (Georg.) Calendars; the Gothic (Goth.) Calendars in Migne (Patrology); the Syrian (Syr.) and Nestorian (Nest.) in Etheridge (Syrian Churches) and Assemanus (Bibl. Orient. iii. 2, 380); for the British and Irish (Br.)

Gallican (Gall.) and German (Germ.) churches, Hampson (Medii Aevi Kal.). Reference has also been made to Neale (Int. to Hist. East. Church.), Fortescue (Arm. Church.), L'Art de Vérifier les Dates, and Ducange (Glossarium).

Δεύς, ἀρίζηλος = ἀρίδηλος, ζυγόν for δυογόν, and conversely δια- into ζα-. Of this we have examples in ζάβατος = διάβατος, ζάδηλος = διάδηλος, and in Latin zacones = diaconi, zametrus = diametrus, zebus = diebus, zeta = diaeta (Rönsch, Italia und Vulgata, p. 509). We find instances of the use of Zabulus in Cyprian, "nobis a Zabulo obsistitur" (Orat. ii.), "Zabulum qui zelum imitatur" (Zel. et Liv. lib. iv.), "invidia Zabuli" (c. 8), "in laqueum Zabuli"; in Ambrose, who denounces Arius as being worse than "pater suus Zabulus. Zabulus enim verum Dei filium fatebatur, Arius negat" (de Fid. lib. v. c. 8); in Augustine, who says of St. Lawrence, "adversus omnes Zabuli terrores . . . animus immobilis perstat" (De diversis; Serm. 123). Lactantius uses it frequently; cf. providens Deus ne fraudibus suis Zabulus . . . corrumpere (Instit. ii. 14. 1), "novem praeliis Zabulum debellasti" (De Mort. Persec. 16. 5), "a te Zabulus victus est" (ibid. 16. 10). It is also found in Hilary in Matt. xii. can. 12; Matt. xxiv. can. 26; Paulinus, pp. 28, 50, 55, 291, 498, and Commodian, Instr. i. 35; ii. 17, 18, 31). [E. V.]
